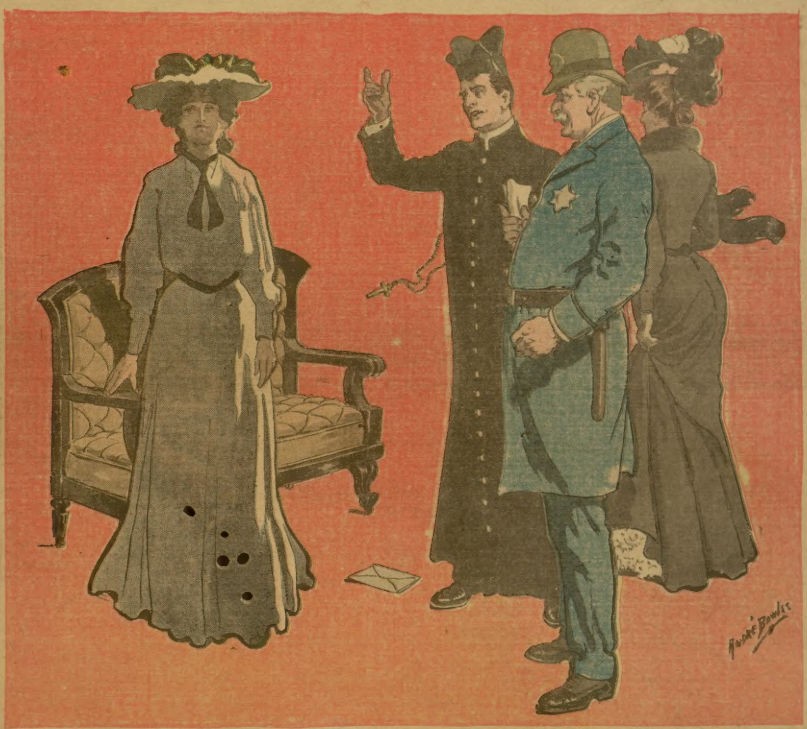
READ "THE SECRET MARRIAGE," BEGINNING IN NEXT WEEK'S LEDGER

THE CHICAGO LEDGER

VOL. XXXV. NO. 26. CHICAGO, ILL., SATURDAY, JUNE 29, 1907. SINGLE COPIES 5 CENTS.



The Damnation of Father Fitzgerald.

By Helena Ballard White.

[Copyright by W. D. Boyce Co.]

CHAPTER I.

"What in all the excitement about?" questioned the priest, as he passed hurriedly [illegible] steps of the parish house in his robe and [illegible] anxiously into the faces of the [illegible] crowd of schoolgirls.

"Mercedes Maturin has drowned herself!" exclaimed one.

"My God!" burst from the white lips of the priest. He staggered like a drunken man and fished against the post of the steps for support.

"Look, they are bringing her now—there they come from the lake with her, father!" cried his informant.

Turning and looking in the direction that she pointed he saw four men coming toward him bearing a stretcher, while a wild throng of boys and girls, with a few adults, followed or crowded close to catch a glimpse of the dripping form that lay uncovered upon the bier.

"There must be some mistake! It cannot, it cannot be—Mercedes!" gasped the priest, his face blanching whiter still, as he looked upon the scene.

"Yes, it is Mercedes Maturin and she did it on purpose, because——"

Not waiting to hear the rest the priest hurried on, bareheaded, half-way down the block to meet the sad procession.

One glance at the dead and he turned away with a stifled groan.

There was no mistaking the perfect features that were upturned to the broad light of day; there was no mistaking the wealth of golden hair that streamed, dripping and gleaming in the shadowless sun; there was no mistaking the little white hand that fell limp from the bier. Yes, it was Mercedes—the beautiful Mercedes Maturin, the pride and pet of the school and parish.

Recovering himself, the young father ordered the men to carry their burden into the house, then, quietly dispersing the crowd, slowly passed up the steps and closed the door behind him.

After listening to the tragic tale of self-destruction and giving a few instructions as to the disposal of the remains, the priest hurried to his chamber and closeted himself within.

Night had fallen ere he emerged. Learning that the unfortunate girl had been prepared for burial and borne to the church chapel, he went at once to look upon the remains.

As he stepped within the dimly lighted place he glanced at the casket then upon the two nuns who knelt in prayer. They arose upon seeing who it was that came into their presence, and after a few whispered words, passed out and left the priest alone with the dead.

He went at once and leaned over the uncovered casket, gazing long and steadfastly upon the flower-covered corpse. The little hands were as white, as wax-like and as perfect of mould as the lilies which they held. The flower-like face turned up to his own, rivaled in its loveliness and its purity the roses that clustered against its coldness.

At last he fell upon his knees beside the coffin with a groan, the anguish of which might have rent the heart of any listener. He remained silent for some time, then rose and looked again into the cold, beautiful face of the dead.

His nails clenched deep into his flesh with suppressed inward agony. The fine features of his pallid, haggard face, contracted painfully, and took on lines of still deeper suffering.

"Almighty and merciful God," he began, then broke off. "There is no God! There is no God in Heaven or earth! The Bible is false—religion have been false—false as hell! killed you, my poor darling! This cant, this creed, this sin! I chose between—I cast you, a living, suffering soul aside for a few cobwebs strung by fanatics —by diseased and fanciful brains! For the sake of cherishing and keeping alive a myth, I sacrificed your human life—your soul, and broke your young heart! Christ, why did I do it? I was insane to have done this thing! Why did I not listen to my convictions instead of that of others? Nature's laws, not God's, are the laws to follow. Nature whispered, take her to your heart. My religious vows demanded that I put her out of it. Nature said, be a man. The priesthood said, be a craven. And so I turned from the still, small voice and the whisperings of love and listened to that of mendacity. Your life had had to pay for it. Your life, my dear one, is the price I have to pay for in sticking to the chains of these rags! In a rage he rent the robe which he wore with frenzied and powerful fingers, and flung it from him. Then he fell upon the corpse, raising his tears and his kisses on the marble face and lips of the lovely one. In the longing and despair that had filled his heart for months he now vented in tones of awful misery:

"Oh, my angel, my queen, my beauty, my love, I have killed, I have murdered you! Poor, sad, little aching heart—how I have crushed it! How could I have been so blind, for aiding in this crime, it is more than I can forgive myself! Why did you permit the sacrifice? You, too, were an accomplice! But rubbish! Here I go railing and ranting at some inanimate, unresponsive thing, while being—shouldering my sins upon a myth! It is that of the false doctrine, and my own cursed, witless brain! There is no personal God. God means something higher, grander, than to be personal, or at all. God means nature and nature means God. Nature would not have betrayed you. Nature makes no mistakes. From this hour on I am through with creeds, with dogmas, then and there—with the teachings of false prophets. From now on I shall set myself up as revealing the laws of God to men and women to worship the true God —Nature. Of the world that is worthy to worship wisely. Speaking through this medium, Nature, the Almighty God did all I have done! I could to make you and me take the right path. He gave me his most precious gift—love. I spurned it—I cast it from me, while my heart cried out against it. It is a thing which I can never regain. But I can bury with it these things that have played me false. I bury my faith, my so-called truth with you, my darling, and my priest's robe! It, too, shall be buried with you. It has proven your shroud and so it shall be!"

Now raising the corpse in an upright position he let a strange thing. In his madness, his insanity of grief, he snatched up the linen from the table, which he had used tossed it and wound it tenderly about her body.

"This is the befitting burial robe for you, my angel! This, this rag that came between you—that showed the your young life! This is the shroud that must go to the grave with you! I must bury it, too, so shall I bury all that has been the cause of your death!"

Putting his arms about her, wild with extreme and longing, he now crushed the inanimate form to his breast with all the insanity of his nature, fondly caressing the cold little face and calling her as he thought she were a living thing. He pressed his lips upon hers, breathing his very life into hers.

"Mercedes! Mercedes, my angel, my love! open your eyes and look at me! Look at me, Mercedes! You are not dead! I cannot give you up! Mercedes, in the name of God, speak—answer me—come to me!"

Was it love that answered? Love that brought her back to life? or did the wild, impassioned cry that broke upon the quiet of the place, rouse from the last lingering spark of vitality and stir it to activity once again? She only been lying in a swoon—or was it a miracle?

This question the priest was never enabled to answer. Half the words were opened, the pale lips wreathed in a strange smile, and wound after wound slowly creeping back into the chilled veins as he held her thus.

"Great God!" grasped the man in a hollow voice, then fell senseless to the floor, the arm clasped his side and the cloth outstanding after them.

"Where am I, Fabian? Where am I? What does all this mean?" cried the frightened girl in a weak, trembling voice.

Rebounding herself from the bold she gave a quick glance around, followed by a little terrified shriek, as she realized she was the surging back to her dulled senses, cried out:

"I know—I remember—I threw myself in the lake! I was in my coffin! I was to have been buried! Oh, I came to—as—as I feared, yes, be cared! He loves me, he loves me, Fabian, Fabian, Fabian! Speak to me—to your Mercedes," she cried, now shaking and kissing him by turns. "I live! I live! Fabian."

After a few moments his faculties being restored, Fabian leaned up and folded his arms about her again.

"You live, you live! What a miracle! God be praised! God is good—how good God is! The God of Nature heard my cry and answered it!"

After a long embrace in which the tears of both were mingled Sister Clarice—Sister Claudia, as they walked down the aisle.

"I will remain to see that the girl is order," said the priest as they turned to go. "And, Mercedes, I would have a word with you alone."

As she came back the nuns passed on to the door and stood waiting for her in respectful silence.

"Be in my studio by nine o'clock tomorrow evening," he whispered.

"I shall be there—I must know my fate," murmured Mercedes. "Do not fail me, Fabian! Oh, Fabian, Fabian, how I love you!" she concluded, then turned to follow the nuns.

CHAPTER II.

Mercedes Maturin was orphaned when a mere babe. Her young mother, when dying, had placed her in the arms of her dearest friend, Agnes Fitzgerald, a sister of the priest, requesting her to bring the babe up as her own. Out of the fortune left by Mercedes' mother the foster mother was to be liberally rewarded for the care of her young charge.

So it came that Mercedes was taken to live in the home of her guardian. Fabian Fitzgerald was then but a boy of ten. A few years later he went abroad to be educated for the priesthood. He did not see Agnes again until a few months before the tragic affair, which came near ending her life.

Having finished his studies and entered the priesthood, he returned to his old home and neighborhood to preside over the church in that parish, and Mercedes, with his sister Agnes, went to the priest's house to live with him as their father. The church and school where the young girl received her religious instruction and her education were next door.

When Fabian Fitzgerald first beheld his foster sister's child in the fourth and bloom and beauty of her seventeen summers, his eyes as they met, had answered to the passion in full measure and meaning.

Well understanding the condition before the world he sought desperately against the acknowledgment of this passion. Seeing that he avoided her, the young girl Mercedes understood the reason or thought she did, too, and the signs of love in the pale, white god that he bare no tales of the love and anguish that were eating out his own heart.

Her joyous laugh with its sweet contagion soon fled, and the eyes their wild sparkle. They had now a look in them so sad so dejected, that Fabian could not bear to see, also, of her studies. She seemed suddenly to lose all interest in life and its pleasures.

All observed and wondered. Her good foster-mother, Agnes, sought relief from the physician. She also confided her fears to her brother, the priest. Teaching of the cause of the girl's young life, Fabian, in his heart-sickness, sent for her. Mercedes came, but was not right that she should bear it alone, neither was it right for her to suffer in silence and die. Fabian should seek her and learn the reason of her trouble and the cause of her dejection, also of her studies. She seemed suddenly to lose all interest in life's pleasures.

"Yes, it is my duty," he said himself, "as much as it is my privilege. The sweet confessions may be unfounded. It may not be the constant thought that I am a man that she loves, being which has so changed her. It may be some one outside. I do not believe that, however. At any rate I must learn what it is. Matters cannot go on in this way."

Acting on this resolution, he sought her one evening in the garden back of the parsonage.

As he came upon her she looked up frightened and turned to go.

Mercedes!" he called and she returned.

"You are not doing right to remain away from the confessional," he said, steadying her eyes.

"It is Father," she gasped.

"I shall expect you in the morning."

"Oh, Father!"

"And for three?"

"I—I cannot come. Don't ask it," she faltered.

"I shall expect you. Do not fail to be there," he said, somewhat sternly, then turned and walked away.

When he had gone, the young girl sank down upon the bench and buried her face in sorrow and her secret to the stars. Long that night she remained there, only rising from so trying an ordeal.

"I cannot face him with this," she moaned. "He must come and confess me. He has guessed already that what I would have confessed to him. I cannot, I cannot be me for it. No, I cannot, I cannot confirm his suspicions. I will go down stairs, and tell him—knowing, so well knowing."

Fabian Fitzgerald was greatly surprised when morning came and she did not go to bring the truant to the confessional as he had expected.

He was busy during the day and saw nothing of her, but when night had fallen he sent for her to come upon him.

Searching his mind for some subterfuge he said would serve for the time.

"I was about to take her over to the house and fearing that the child was in a natural condition wrapped my robe about her."

"Very thoughtful of you," replied Sister Clarice. "But we had better go now and provide for the child, that she may have a glorious news. And you, dear child, must be put to bed. Come, can you walk or shall I send Mercedes to carry you?"

"Oh, I feel quite strong—very strong indeed. I can easily walk over there. It is a few steps next door," replied Mercedes. "Nothing is troubling me but the remorse that I have caused you to be tangled again, dear sisters, until I have had your forgiveness and that of the church and school. They will think me very wicked."

"We shall talk of that another time, Mercedes, for of course, you have our forgiveness, but come, you must ask that, o Sister Claudia, and lean upon your kind Sister Claudia, as they walked down the aisle.

"I will remain to see that the girl is order," said the priest as they turned to go. "And, Mercedes, I would have a word with you alone."

As she came back, the nuns passed on to the door and stood waiting for her in respectful silence.

"Be in my studio by nine o'clock tomorrow evening," he whispered.

"I shall be there—I must know my fate," murmured Mercedes. "Do not fail me, Fabian! Oh, Fabian, Fabian, how I love you!" she concluded, then turned to follow the nuns.

CHAPTER II.

Mercedes Maturin was orphaned when a mere babe. Her young mother, when dying, had placed her in the arms of her dearest friend, Agnes Fitzgerald, a sister of the priest, requesting her to bring the babe up as her own. Out of the fortune left by Mercedes' mother the foster mother was to be liberally rewarded for the care of her young charge.

So it came that Mercedes was taken to live in the home of her guardian. Fabian Fitzgerald was then but a boy of ten. A few years later he went abroad to be educated for the priesthood. He did not see Agnes again until a few months before the tragic affair, which came near ending her life.

Having finished his studies and entered the priesthood, he returned to his old home and neighborhood to preside over the church in that parish, and Mercedes, with his sister Agnes, went to the priest's house to live with him as their father. The church and school where the young girl received her religious instruction and her education were next door.

When Fabian Fitzgerald first beheld his sister's child in the fourth and bloom and beauty of her seventeen summers, his eyes as they met, had answered to the passion in full measure and meaning.

Well understanding the condition before the world he sought desperately against the acknowledgment of this passion. Seeing that he avoided her, the young girl Mercedes understood the reason or thought she did, too, and the signs of love in the pale, white god that he bare no tales of the love and anguish that were eating out his own heart.

Her joyous laugh with its sweet contagion soon fled, and the eyes their wild sparkle. They had now a look in them so sad so dejected, that Fabian could not bear to see, also, of her studies. She seemed suddenly to lose all interest in life's pleasures.

All observed and wondered. Her good foster-mother, Agnes, sought relief from the physician. She also confided her fears to her brother, the priest. Teaching of the cause of the girl's young life, Fabian, in his heart-sickness, sent for her. Mercedes came, but was not right that she should bear it alone, neither was it right for her to suffer in silence and die. Fabian should seek her and learn the reason of her trouble and the cause of her dejection, also of her studies. She seemed suddenly to lose all interest in life's pleasures. Yes, it is my duty," he told himself, "as much as it is my privilege. The sweet confessions may be unfounded. It may not be the constant thought that I am a man that she loves, being which has so changed her. It may be some one outside. I do not believe that, however. At any rate I must learn what it is. Matters cannot go on in this way."

Acting on this resolution, he sought her one evening in the garden back of the parsonage.

As he came upon her she looked up frightened and turned to go.

Mercedes!" he called and she returned.

"You are not doing right to remain away from the confessional," he said, steadying her eyes.

"It is Father," she gasped.

"I shall expect you in the morning."

"Oh, Father!"

"And for three?"

"I—I cannot come. Don't ask it," she faltered.

"I shall expect you. Do not fail to be there," he said, somewhat sternly, then turned and walked away.

When he had gone, the young girl sank down upon the bench and buried her face in sorrow and her secret to the stars. Long that night she remained there, only rising from so trying an ordeal.

"I cannot face him with this," she moaned. "He must come and confess me. He has guessed already that what I would have confessed to him. I cannot, I cannot be me for it. No, I cannot, I cannot confirm his suspicions. I will go down stairs, and tell him—knowing, so well knowing."

Fabian Fitzgerald was greatly surprised when morning came and she did not go to bring the truant to the confessional as he had expected.

He was busy during the day and saw nothing of her, but when night had fallen he sent for her to come upon him.

Searching his mind for some subterfuge he said would serve for the time.

"I was about to take her over to the house and fearing that the child was in a natural condition wrapped my robe about her."

"Very thoughtful of you," replied Sister Clarice. "But we had better go now and provide for the child, that she may have a glorious news. And you, dear child, must be put to bed. Come, can you walk or shall I send Mercedes to carry you?"

"Oh, I feel quite strong—very strong indeed. I can easily walk over there. It is a few steps next door," replied Mercedes. "Nothing is troubling me but the remorse that I have caused you to be tangled again, dear sisters, until I have had your forgiveness and that of the church and school. They will think me very wicked."

"We shall talk of that another time, Mercedes, for of course, you have our forgiveness, but come, you must ask that, o Sister Claudia, and lean upon your kind Sister Claudia, as they walked down the aisle.

"I will remain to see that the girl is order," said the priest as they turned to go. "And, Mercedes, I would have a word with you alone."

As she came back, the nuns passed on to the door and stood waiting for her in respectful silence.

"Be in my studio by nine o'clock tomorrow evening," he whispered.

"I shall be there—I must know my fate," murmured Mercedes. "Do not fail me, Fabian! Oh, Fabian, Fabian, how I love you!" she concluded, then turned to follow the nuns.

CHAPTER III.

Mercedes Maturin was orphaned when a mere babe. Her young mother, when dying, had placed her in the arms of her dearest friend, Agnes Fitzgerald, a sister of the priest, requesting her to bring the babe up as her own. Out of the fortune left by Mercedes' mother the foster mother was to be liberally rewarded for the care of her young charge.

So it came that Mercedes was taken to live in the home of her guardian. Fabian Fitzgerald was then but a boy of ten. A few years later he went abroad to be educated for the priesthood. He did not see Agnes again until a few months before the tragic affair, which came near ending her life.

Having finished his studies and entered the priesthood, he returned to his old home and neighborhood to preside over the church in that parish, and Mercedes, with his sister Agnes, went to the priest's house to live with him as their father. The church and school where the young girl received her religious instruction and her education were next door.

When Fabian Fitzgerald first beheld his sister's child in the fourth and bloom and beauty of her seventeen summers, his eyes as they met, had answered to the passion in full measure and meaning.

Well understanding the condition before the world he sought desperately against the acknowledgment of this passion. Seeing that he avoided her, the young girl Mercedes understood the reason or thought she did, too, and the signs of love in the pale, white god that he bare no tales of the love and anguish that were eating out his own heart.

Her joyous laugh with its sweet contagion soon fled, and the eyes their wild sparkle. They had now a look in them so sad so dejected, that Fabian could not bear to see, also, of her studies. She seemed suddenly to lose all interest in life's pleasures.

All observed and wondered. Her good foster-mother, Agnes, sought relief from the physician. She also confided her fears to her brother, the priest. Teaching of the cause of the girl's young life, Fabian, in his heart-sickness, sent for her. Mercedes came, but was not right that she should bear it alone, neither was it right for her to suffer in silence and die. Fabian should seek her and learn the reason of her trouble and the cause of her dejection, also of her studies. She seemed suddenly to lose all interest in life's pleasures. Yes, it is my duty," he told himself, "as much as it is my privilege. The sweet confessions may be unfounded. It may not be the constant thought that I am a man that she loves, being which has so changed her. It may be some one outside. I do not believe that, however. At any rate I must learn what it is. Matters cannot go on in this way."

Acting on this resolution, he sought her one evening in the garden back of the parsonage.

As he came upon her she looked up frightened and turned to go.

Mercedes!" he called and she returned.

"You are not doing right to remain away from the confessional," he said, steadying her eyes.

"It is Father," she gasped.

"I shall expect you in the morning."

"Oh, Father!"

"And for three?"

"I—I cannot come. Don't ask it," she faltered.

"I shall expect you. Do not fail to be there," he said, somewhat sternly, then turned and walked away.

When he had gone, the young girl sank down upon the bench and buried her face in sorrow and her secret to the stars. Long that night she remained there, only rising from so trying an ordeal.

"I cannot face him with this," she moaned. "He must come and confess me. He has guessed already that what I would have confessed to him. I cannot, I cannot be me for it. No, I cannot, I cannot confirm his suspicions. I will go down stairs, and tell him—knowing, so well knowing."

Fabian Fitzgerald was greatly surprised when morning came and she did not go to bring the truant to the confessional as he had expected.

He was busy during the day and saw nothing of her, but when night had fallen he sent for her to come upon him.

Searching his mind for some subterfuge he said would serve for the time.

"I was about to take her over to the house and fearing that the child was in a natural condition wrapped my robe about her."

"Very thoughtful of you," replied Sister Clarice. "But we had better go now and provide for the child, that she may have a glorious news. And you, dear child, must be put to bed. Come, can you walk or shall I send Mercedes to carry you?"

"Oh, I feel quite strong—very strong indeed. I can easily walk over there. It is a few steps next door," replied Mercedes. "Nothing is troubling me but the remorse that I have caused you to be tangled again, dear sisters, until I have had your forgiveness and that of the church and school. They will think me very wicked."

"We shall talk of that another time, Mercedes, for of course, you have our forgiveness, but come, you must ask that, o Sister Claudia, and lean upon your kind Sister Claudia, as they walked down the aisle.

"I will remain to see that the girl is order," said the priest as they turned to go. "And, Mercedes, I would have a word with you alone."

As she came back, the nuns passed on to the door and stood waiting for her in respectful silence.

"Be in my studio by nine o'clock tomorrow evening," he whispered.

"I shall be there—I must know my fate," murmured Mercedes. "Do not fail me, Fabian! Oh, Fabian, Fabian, how I love you!" she concluded, then turned to follow the nuns.

CHAPTER IV.

Mercedes Maturin was orphaned when a mere babe. Her young mother, when dying, had placed her in the arms of her dearest friend, Agnes Fitzgerald, a sister of the priest, requesting her to bring the babe up as her own. Out of the fortune left by Mercedes' mother the foster mother was to be liberally rewarded for the care of her young charge.

So it came that Mercedes was taken to live in the home of her guardian. Fabian Fitzgerald was then but a boy of ten. A few years later he went abroad to be educated for the priesthood. He did not see Agnes again until a few months before the tragic affair, which came near ending her life.

Having finished his studies and entered the priesthood, he returned to his old home and neighborhood to preside over the church in that parish, and Mercedes, with his sister Agnes, went to the priest's house to live with him as their father. The church and school where the young girl received her religious instruction and her education were next door.

When Fabian Fitzgerald first beheld his sister's child in the fourth and bloom and beauty of her seventeen summers, his eyes as they met, had answered to the passion in full measure and meaning.

Well understanding the condition before the world he sought desperately against the acknowledgment of this passion. Seeing that he avoided her, the young girl Mercedes understood the reason or thought she did, too, and the signs of love in the pale, white god that he bare no tales of the love and anguish that were eating out his own heart.

Her joyous laugh with its sweet contagion soon fled, and the eyes their wild sparkle. They had now a look in them so sad so dejected, that Fabian could not bear to see, also, of her studies. She seemed suddenly to lose all interest in life's pleasures.

All observed and wondered. Her good foster-mother, Agnes, sought relief from the physician. She also confided her fears to her brother, the priest. Teaching of the cause of the girl's young life, Fabian, in his heart-sickness, sent for her. Mercedes came, but was not right that she should bear it alone, neither was it right for her to suffer in silence and die. Fabian should seek her and learn the reason of her trouble and the cause of her dejection, also of her studies. She seemed suddenly to lose all interest in life's pleasures. Yes, it is my duty," he told himself, "as much as it is my privilege. The sweet confessions may be unfounded. It may not be the constant thought that I am a man that she loves, being which has so changed her. It may be some one outside. I do not believe that, however. At any rate I must learn what it is. Matters cannot go on in this way."

Acting on this resolution, he sought her one evening in the garden back of the parsonage.

As he came upon her she looked up frightened and turned to go.

Mercedes!" he called and she returned.

"You are not doing right to remain away from the confessional," he said, steadying her eyes.

"It is Father," she gasped.

"I shall expect you in the morning."

"Oh, Father!"

"And for three?"

"I—I cannot come. Don't ask it," she faltered.

"I shall expect you. Do not fail to be there," he said, somewhat sternly, then turned and walked away.

When he had gone, the young girl sank down upon the bench and buried her face in sorrow and her secret to the stars. Long that night she remained there, only rising from so trying an ordeal.

"I cannot face him with this," she moaned. "He must come and confess me. He has guessed already that what I would have confessed to him. I cannot, I cannot be me for it. No, I cannot, I cannot confirm his suspicions. I will go down stairs, and tell him—knowing, so well knowing."

Fabian Fitzgerald was greatly surprised when morning came and she did not go to bring the truant to the confessional as he had expected.

He was busy during the day and saw nothing of her, but when night had fallen he sent for her to come upon him.

Searching his mind for some subterfuge he said would serve for the time.

"I was about to take her over to the house and fearing that the child was in a natural condition wrapped my robe about her."

"Very thoughtful of you," replied Sister Clarice. "But we had better go now and provide for the child, that she may have a glorious news. And you, dear child, must be put to bed. Come, can you walk or shall I send Mercedes to carry you?"

"Oh, I feel quite strong—very strong indeed. I can easily walk over there. It is a few steps next door," replied Mercedes. "Nothing is troubling me but the remorse that I have caused you to be tangled again, dear sisters, until I have had your forgiveness and that of the church and school. They will think me very wicked."

"We shall talk of that another time, Mercedes, for of course, you have our forgiveness, but come, you must ask that, o Sister Claudia, and lean upon your kind Sister Claudia, as they walked down the aisle.

"I will remain to see that the girl is order," said the priest as they turned to go. "And, Mercedes, I would have a word with you alone."

As she came back, the nuns passed on to the door and stood waiting for her in respectful silence.

"Be in my studio by nine o'clock tomorrow evening," he whispered.

"I shall be there—I must know my fate," murmured Mercedes. "Do not fail me, Fabian! Oh, Fabian, Fabian, how I love you!" she concluded, then turned to follow the nuns.

CHAPTER V.

Mercedes Maturin was orphaned when a mere babe. Her young mother, when dying, had placed her in the arms of her dearest friend, Agnes Fitzgerald, a sister of the priest, requesting her to bring the babe up as her own. Out of the fortune left by Mercedes' mother the foster mother was to be liberally rewarded for the care of her young charge.

So it came that Mercedes was taken to live in the home of her guardian. Fabian Fitzgerald was then but a boy of ten. A few years later he went abroad to be educated for the priesthood. He did not see Agnes again until a few months before the tragic affair, which came near ending her life.

Having finished his studies and entered the priesthood, he returned to his old home and neighborhood to preside over the church in that parish, and Mercedes, with his sister Agnes, went to the priest's house to live with him as their father. The church and school where the young girl received her religious instruction and her education were next door.

When Fabian Fitzgerald first beheld his sister's child in the fourth and bloom and beauty of her seventeen summers, his eyes as they met, had answered to the passion in full measure and meaning.

Well understanding the condition before the world he sought desperately against the acknowledgment of this passion. Seeing that he avoided her, the young girl Mercedes understood the reason or thought she did, too, and the signs of love in the pale, white god that he bare no tales of the love and anguish that were eating out his own heart.

Her joyous laugh with its sweet contagion soon fled, and the eyes their wild sparkle. They had now a look in them so sad so dejected, that Fabian could not bear to see, also, of her studies. She seemed suddenly to lose all interest in life's pleasures.

All observed and wondered. Her good foster-mother, Agnes, sought relief from the physician. She also confided her fears to her brother, the priest. Teaching of the cause of the girl's young life, Fabian, in his heart-sickness, sent for her. Mercedes came, but was not right that she should bear it alone, neither was it right for her to suffer in silence and die. Fabian should seek her and learn the reason of her trouble and the cause of her dejection, also of her studies. She seemed suddenly to lose all interest in life's pleasures. Yes, it is my duty," he told himself, "as much as it is my privilege. The sweet confessions may be unfounded. It may not be the constant thought that I am a man that she loves, being which has so changed her. It may be some one outside. I do not believe that, however. At any rate I must learn what it is. Matters cannot go on in this way."

Acting on this resolution, he sought her one evening in the garden back of the parsonage.

As he came upon her she looked up frightened and turned to go.

Mercedes!" he called and she returned.

"You are not doing right to remain away from the confessional," he said, steadying her eyes.

"It is Father," she gasped.

"I shall expect you in the morning."

"Oh, Father!"

"And for three?"

"I—I cannot come. Don't ask it," she faltered.

"I shall expect you. Do not fail to be there," he said, somewhat sternly, then turned and walked away.

When he had gone, the young girl sank down upon the bench and buried her face in sorrow and her secret to the stars. Long that night she remained there, only rising from so trying an ordeal.

"I cannot face him with this," she moaned. "He must come and confess me. He has guessed already that what I would have confessed to him. I cannot, I cannot be me for it. No, I cannot, I cannot confirm his suspicions. I will go down stairs, and tell him—knowing, so well knowing."

Fabian Fitzgerald was greatly surprised when morning came and she did not go to bring the truant to the confessional as he had expected.

He was busy during the day and saw nothing of her, but when night had fallen he sent for her to come upon him.

Searching his mind for some subterfuge he said would serve for the time.

"I was about to take her over to the house and fearing that the child was in a natural condition wrapped my robe about her."

"Very thoughtful of you," replied Sister Clarice. "But we had better go now and provide for the child, that she may have a glorious news. And you, dear child, must be put to bed. Come, can you walk or shall I send Mercedes to carry you?"

"Oh, I feel quite strong—very strong indeed. I can easily walk over there. It is a few steps next door," replied Mercedes. "Nothing is troubling me but the remorse that I have caused you to be tangled again, dear sisters, until I have had your forgiveness and that of the church and school. They will think me very wicked."

"We shall talk of that another time, Mercedes, for of course, you have our forgiveness, but come, you must ask that, o Sister Claudia, and lean upon your kind Sister Claudia, as they walked down the aisle.

"I will remain to see that the girl is order," said the priest as they turned to go. "And, Mercedes, I would have a word with you alone."

As she came back, the nuns passed on to the door and stood waiting for her in respectful silence.

"Be in my studio by nine o'clock tomorrow evening," he whispered.

"I shall be there—I must know my fate," murmured Mercedes. "Do not fail me, Fabian! Oh, Fabian, Fabian, how I love you!" she concluded, then turned to follow the nuns.

"I would there were more to lay at the feet of love as a sacrifice, my angel. Love shall beseech claim its own. I feel that I do right in renouncing and denouncing everything that stands between. Indeed, there is no regret. So, Mercedes, my love, in a very short time now we shall have done with care and worry and secrecy. We shall be bound together by the holiest of vows and live to love, and love to live!"

"That you ever shall!" whispered a woman's voice outside the swinging doors, as she turned and slipped noiselessly away."

EDITH."

CHAPTER III.

On the following evening at dusk, Fabian Fitzgerald was handed a message that caused a frown to settle on his handsome features. It read:

"Come to me this night. I must see you even though it be for the last time. I have a confession to make. Come about nine o'clock.

EDITH."

"What can she want?" he angrily exclaimed, twisting the message and tossing it into a waste-basket. "Confessing pah! Will she never let me alone? Well, I suppose I must go. I had better get it and have it over with. Always the last time, and yet it never is. I wonder if she really has something to confess or if this is merely a ruse on her part to see me. What a fool I was to be led on by her intrigues as I was myself in this tangle! How I have hated myself for yielding to her continually advances and blandishments, and giving her this rod to hold over my head for the rest of my days. Yes, I have been a fool to permit her to lead me on in this way against my better judgement!"

It was with such thoughts as these that the agonized young man of the yoking priest passing up the steps of a red brick house in the street just back of the church.

He found her alone in the dimly lighted parlor.

"So you came," she said, as he stepped into the room. "There, do not look so sheepishly about you, Fabian, you're a priest, and besides, there is no one else on the premises. Brother left again for the West today and I sent the maid to spend the day out on the South Side. She will not return until late."

"Why all this explaining? It matters not to me who is here or who isn't."

"Oh, pardon, I thought it might. I feared you would be displeased should any one find you out—learn that you had been calling."

"Well, it matters not, anything in a sense."

"You have always given me to understand that it might prove nothing less than your utter damnation, to be seen making love to one."

"I still think so, were I really making love to one."

"How right you are! I never knew before last night how right you were, and when she answered with a knowing, tantalizing smile.

"Well, well," he said impatiently, "what has this to do with your message?"

"Your message?" he repeated sharply, and putting his hand on the knob swung through the doors.

"You shall be made to realize that I have followed your instructions," she called, as he hurried down the hall.

"Lord, give me forty evil men instead of this! Will nothing stop me from being the priest as he hurried along." I think it will prove the most trying ordeal I have ever. I have listened to these constantly ever since I entered the priesthood—all the while loathing myself for listening. It matters little now what she may tell the priest, I shall be through with her and free to leave them; still, I would not have them misjudge me. I should like to hold their respect."

He was about to enter the parish house when his eye caught sight of a tall, slender figure gliding across the boulevard. Then it disappeared in the shadow of the immediate neighborhood, but upon seeing the coast turn the corner concealed that and with his sister and Mercedes, repaired to the parlor of the house.

"What does this mean?" he asked himself. "Has she turned over a lump or—or—Bah! I'm getting hurried within going directly to my room.

Here he took off his street coat and was about to don a robe when his sister burst into the room.

"Fabian, there is a fire just back of us. It seems to be Burke's house that is burning. Come, hurry!"

It was in a bewildered frame of mind that the young priest took away from home, and with his sister and Mercedes, repaired to the scene of the fire.

"What does this mean?" he asked himself. "Has she turned over a lump or—or—Bah! I'm getting hurried within,

"A most unfortunate circumstance, my calling when I did," mumbled the priest, as he sank heavily into a chair.

"Have you anything to say in refutation, sir?" questioned the reporter.

"I am too dumfounded to think," answered the stricken man. "What evidence you people can trump up! Kindly excuse me now, sir, and call again. I shall probably hand you a written statement of facts. In the meantime, you are safe in declaring my innocence of the crime. My God, this is hard to believe!" groaned the astounded man.

Scarce had the words fallen from his white lips when two officers stepped into the room.

"I have a warrant for your arrest, Father Fitzgerald," said one.

The other stepped up and examined the buttons of his clothes. "Please produce the coat or coats that you wore when calling on Miss Burke last evening," he said.

"They hang together on a rack in my room, both the under and top coat," answered the priest.

In a short time the officer returned, carrying on his arm the prelate's overcoat, longing to the young priest.

"I see there is a button gone from it. The one which was picked up in the hallway near the murdered girl's room, and which I have in my possession, exactly matches those now on the coat. I also found this message here, requesting you to call, in the waste-basket."

Father Fitzgerald sat for a moment greatly excited, glancing into the face of the officer without saying a word. Recovering himself he said:

"I swear I was in no room but the parlor—possibly it dropped off the floor when she picked it up, carrying it with her to the other floor where it was carelessly dropped. May I look at the button and the coat? Humph, no detective who should be in the business could say that button fell from the coat," laughed the priest. "Can't you see that it has been twisted off? By Heaven, I have a thought!"

"Well, we have no time to argue this point now. That can be left to the lawyers. I shall have to ask you to come with us to the station, Father Fitzgerald, our wagon waits outside."

"I shall have no trouble in establishing my innocence. Call a carriage and I will make ready to leave with you at once," answered the priest.

The officers were passing through the hallway with their prisoner, when a pitiful cry was heard and Mercedes came hurriedly down the stairway.

"I have just heard—I have just heard—Oh, Fabian!" she moaned.

The accused man requested the privilege of stepping back into the library to speak with the distracted girl.

As the door closed upon them she threw herself into his arms with a despairing cry.

"Dear be foolish, child! You cannot believe any of these outrageous reports, Mercedes?" he asked as she sobbed upon his breast.

"Oh, Fabian, what an insult to my intelligence and my womanhood to ask such a question. Do I believe any of these reports? A thousand times, no! And, Fabian, you did not go to see her last night, did you?"

"Yes, that much is true, my dear. She sent—"

"Fabian—Oh, Fabian, so she used to be your sweetheart, then?"

"Well, I suppose you might term it that in an interrogative way."

"And—and you loved her, Fabian?"

"I may have thought so at time. You see I didn't have much knowledge of anything at that tender age. I realize now that I did not love her. Knowing you, little one, has set me right on that point. You are the only woman that I have ever loved."

"Fabian, I believe you," she said, again throwing herself into his arms. "That weight is off my mind. But now about the other. How awful it is, Fabian! What can I do to help you?"

"Pshaw, don't get excited, Mercedes, I'll be back to the house a little while. I have only to interview the officers and explain my presence in her home last evening when they will release me and I shall return to you."

"You think they won't put you in jail, then? I couldn't bear that, Fabian."

He laughed lightly at her childish questions and fears.

"Heaven knows it is bad enough, but not so bad as all that. No, my angel, I shall be back presently. Keep up your courage."

"Can't I go with you?"

"Well, I think the officers might object. Go find Sister Agnes and stay with her until I return, and—leave the papers alone. Where did you get the note, Hilton? Where is Agnes?"

"She went early this morning on some mission of mercy, I do not know just what. I am looking for her every moment. This is Jeremy's day off, you know."

"Her comforter, Mercedes. And now I must go. Goodby, dear heart, for a little while."

"Fabian," she said as he put his hand on the door-knob, "this, this trouble has come upon you all through loving me."

"Nonsense! But even so, I am ready to face the vengeance of the furies for its sweet."

"Fabian, you are so, so noble. I am not worth all this to you. It—is probably, it would have been best had I really divorced. Then she would not have had this cause for jealousy."

"Mercedes, such speeches you should not utter."

"Then your love will endure? Oh, tell me that it will, Fabian," she pleaded. "Don't look back upon it all and think it—if it were not for her I should never have suffered this disgrace."

"Mercedes, you will compel me to be harsh in a moment. Do not harbor such thoughts. Don't you credit me with a spark of manliness?"

"Forgive me, Fabian; I won't say anything like that again. Neither shall I budge from the upper window or let a spoonful of food pass my lips until you come back to me. I shall pray every moment for you—"

"Time's up," came a gruff voice from the hallway, and Fabian passed out with the officers.

"You defy me!"

When he had gone Mercedes took up her position by the window to watch for her husband's return, her heart uplifted in prayer. When summoned to lunch she refused to go and remained all alone in the room until late in the afternoon when the priest's sister in a fit of excitement burst into the room.

"Oh, Mercedes, do you know?" she gasped. "Yes, I know, dear little sister, and he told me to comfort you, but I don't know what to say. I have been trying to think of something comforting to tell myself, but it is vain. I am watching for his return every moment. He has been gone hours and hours—it seems years. Isn't it shocking to think that a holy man, like Fabian, should be suspected of such a crime?"

"He went in, I believe that he is condemned by the general public."

"Oh, no, that could not be. He is too noble—too god-like!"

"It don't trust that he was about to sever his ties with the church and marry you, is it, Mercedes?"

At this unexpected question, Mercedes colored painfully, looked down at the floor, out of the window, then turning and facing her questioner, faltered:

"Yes, Mother Agnes."

"And you both have kept this from me?"

"He did not decide to do this until the night before last. We intended to tell you—"

"Mercedes, why did you throw yourself in the lake?" her companion abruptly asked.

"That is the reason—you have guessed it. I decided to drown myself because I loved him too well to live without him."

"And he refused to marry you?"

"He was not opposed to it."

"Then by this foolish act of yours you have brought him to this!"

Mercedes let her eyes fall from the reproachful ones of her companion and sat silent.

"Don't you realize that you are to blame for all this disgrace and horror, Mercedes?"

"Don't—don't, I can't bear it," at last gasped the girl. "Don't reproach me, little mother."

"It is no hard not to."

"Do you blame me for loving him?"

"I blame you for telling him so."

"He forced me to do so. You, Mother Agnes, influenced him to make me confess."

"Oh, I see—I see—well, this is a pretty mess! You would not have acknowledged it otherwise?"

"I—I think not."

"Then after all, I am the one at fault."

"No, no, the woman—Edith Burke, she did wrong to force herself upon his notice, knowing, well knowing that he did not love her. How could a woman do this?"

"I know all about that affair, Mercedes. I have known for years. It was I who interfered with this marriage and pleaded with him to enter the priesthood. He took my advice, and how proud I have been of him since. Why couldn't the women leave him alone?"

"He wasn't made to be let alone—such a man. He was made to love, Mother Agnes."

"Oh, patience! patience!" sobbed the grief-stricken sister. "If you really loved him as you should—if you loved him more, or yourself less, Mercedes, you would not have influenced him to take this false step. You would have sacrificed your love to his ambition. You would have felt in him the same interest that I do. You would not have listened to his renouncing his vows of faith to marry you."

"I—I never thought of it in that way. Yes, I suppose I have been very, very selfish. I can see it all now. But you know, I am not your fine character, little mother. I am sorry now that I did not tell you all about it and beg you to help me, but with me—just kill me to give him up."

"No, no, thank so. Severe and disappointment do not kill. Both would have been happier had you never consented to this marriage. What is done is done, Mercedes."

"Is—is there nothing which I might do to mend matters?" questioned the girl, now beginning to sob violently. "I would sacrifice myself to save Fabian a heartache!"

"It doesn't do any good to talk about that now. But still you might do this much. When he is released from this ugly charge and returns home you might tell him that you have reconsidered and refuse to have him forsake his profession to marry you. That is the womanly thing, and the unselfish thing to do, Mercedes."

"I would have to talk with Fabian before making you any such promise," said the young girl, now sitting up and drying her eyes. "I am already bound to him by my word of sacred promise. Should he desire to release me—"

"You would go jump in the lake again, I suppose?"

"No, I would go where I might never see him again. For I could not keep from encouraging his love were he near me."

"It would be wise for you to become a nun, Mercedes. That would be your holiest calling on this earth."

"Higher than that of a loving wife?" innocently questioned the girl.

"You could do more good in the world to minister to many instead of one, could you not?"

"Perhaps—perhaps. But why did God put this love into a woman's heart if all to no purpose?"

The older woman winced at this question but replied:

"To try us, no doubt. Temptation has its need. The weak fall before temptation."

"Then if being weak means to love, let me be weak, Mother Agnes. Oh, it is glorious to love—to love as I do Fabian. If I must give him up, I can. But never ask me not to love him. I must go on doing this until I am dead. I could no more help it than I could breathe."

"You are young and so must be foolish. It is hard to argue with youth. But, Mercedes, will you be advised by Father O'Brien?"

"As to what?" questioned the girl with evident alarm.

"To giving up Fabian, of course."

"I do not want to anger you, Mother Agnes, but I must be honest and say I shall be advised by no one but Fabian. And he does not think as Father O'Brien, and I have faith in Fabian's superior judgment."

"Then you know my duty. We must reason with him."

"About—about—"

"Yes, about breaking his pledge with you instead of the church. He has disgraced himself sufficiently. It would never do for him to sever his church connections now. Can't you see this? Haven't you the wisdom to understand?"

Mercedes folded one hand over the other and sank speechless for some moments, then said: "Understand, Mother Agnes, that I think Fabian too well to do this that which will most add to his comfort and happiness, no matter how it may wring my heart. So, if Fabian decides that he will be happier in the end to give me up, I shall abide by his decision."

"Spoken like a brave girl, Mercedes. And now prepare yourself, for I assure you he will come to his senses after this horrible experience has passed and then you can find the fathers. They will be simply horrified to think that he ever dreamed of marrying you. Of course, your being laid out for burial naturally upset him a bit and I think he hardly knew what he was about when he finally consented to marry you. He will remember his path of duty when all this excitement has passed away. So now, Mercedes, what you must do in the meantime is to pray devoutly for forgiveness in tempting him and prepare yourself to become a nun. It is the only thing left for you to do," concluded the foster mother, as she passed from the room.

Agnes Fitzgerald did not mean to be hard. She spoke as she felt and thought, or rather as she had been instructed to feel and think.

CHAPTER IV.

Mercedes remained by the wondow watching until night had fallen, her fears increasing with the lengthening hours. At last, hearing a heavy tread on the stairs, she ran joyfully from her room, thinking that Fabian must have entered the house without her knowledge.

Her hope was quickly dispelled as she confronted Father O'Brien.

"Fabian, where is he?" she anxiously questioned.

"I am sorry to tell you, my dear, that he is held."

"Held? for what? What do you mean?"

"Well, the authorities think that the evidence against him is very strong. Strong enough to hold him responsible for the death of Miss Burke."

"Oh, father! Oh, God!" cried the horrified girl. "You can't mean it! I never dreamed—he never dreamed that they would fix this crime upon him. We all know that he is innocent. You know that he is innocent, father?"

"As innocent of this crime as any angel in Heaven, my child."

"Does Mother Agnes know?"

"I have just told her."

"I must go to him—I must go to Fabian at once!" cried the highly excited girl darting through the doorway.

She went directly to find Mother Agnes, and the two lost no time in hurrying to the prison to look after the comfort of the unfortunate priest.

"It is an outrage!" declared the church people who stood nobly by their priest.

"The charges against him are unconscionable," said the public, "and if he committed this crime, which is one of the most mysterious in history, he was saving face if like tne dog that he is."

Mercedes soon learned that she was quite tne sensation. The beautiful young girl who was the prisoner of Father O'Brien, and who spent so much time with him in his cell, carrying dainties and flowers and reading and praying with him, also attracted much attention. Some new picture or heresy was fresh information of the interesting romance running through the strangely grewsome affair, and seen in nearly every edition of the daily papers.

"They will never convict him," the fallowers around said, and the lawyers for the defense, and even the dead girl's friends to learn if she had not made some admission or acknowledgement of the premeditated crime. But the dead lips no message.

The officers of the law, and the general public became as bitter as fresh evidence was collected against the priest, he realized that the nails were being driven fast and deep into his coffin.

One morning as Mercedes was entering the prison, she was attracted by the following conversation that took place between some women, evidently of the lower

CLEVER DOCTOR

Cured a 20 Year Trouble Without Any Medicine.

A wise Ind. physician cured a 20-years' sinuous disease without any medicine as his patient tells:

"I had stomach trouble for 20 years, tried doctoring in different medicines and all simple remedies suggested by my friends, but grew worse all the time.

"Finally a doctor who is the most prominent physician in this part of the State told me medicine would do me no good, only irritate my stomach and make it worse—that I must look for the cause. I quit drinking coffee.

"I cried out in alarm, "Quit drinking coffee! why, 'What will I drink?'

"Try Postum,' said the doctor. 'I drink it and you will like it when it is made according to directions, and served with cream, for it is delicious and has none of the bad effects coffee has.'

"Well that was over two years ago and I am still drinking Postum. My stomach is right again and I know Doctor hit the nail on the head when he decided coffee was the cause of all my trouble. I only wish I had quit it years ago and drank Postum in its place.'

Never too late to mend. Ten days' trial of Postum in place of coffee works wonders. "There's a Reason."

Read the famous little book, "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs. Physicians call it "A little health classic."

class, who stood just outside the entrance.

"There she is now," said one.

"Humph, taking him flowers again," scoffed another. "I reckon there never was a villain hung that did not find some silly girl to show him favors."

"She's pretty, sure—almost pretty enough to make any man kill another woman in order to win her."

"She's a fool! She'd better carry her flowers out to the cemetery and lay them on the dead girl's grave."

"Likely she believes him guilty just as most people do, but is going to be sensational and get her pictures in the paper. She couldn't have any reason and believe that he is innocent."

Mercedes could endure no more. She turned upon the woman who had made this last remark and said:

"Father Fitzgerald is no more guilty of this crime than yourself."

"How is that? He was the last one that saw her alive, wasn't he?"

"That I do not know."

"Well, the authorities do. Then the servant girl, Katie O'Shea, heard them quarreling, didn't she, and swears he said he could kill her?"

"That proves nothing.'

"Nor that handkerchief ot his picked up outside the window, either, I suppose?"

Mercedes did not answer at once. "No doubt he can satisfactorily explain how it came there" she at last said.

"Yes, and the button off his coat, he can explain that, too, right from the two ways about it. Your lover, the man who you are carrying flowers and gumdrops to, betrayed an honest girl; sifted her just so he could marry you. And you love such a man and uphold him in his crime?"

"I believe in him as I do my God!" said Mercedes solemnly, then turned and entered the prison.

"He'll hang all right," called one.

Mercedes did not answer, but up by the conversation, and observing it, Fabian said:

"An inviting day for visiting you this morning, Mercedes?"

The miserable girl fell to weeping. Finally she checked her sobs, she mumbled:

"They are say—saying such dr—dreadful things about Father Fabian. They ask how came your handkerchief outside the open window on the lower floor of the house, Father Fabian?"

"No, Mercedes, I cannot tell how it came there, but I have my suspicions. I may be wrong and do not care to explain just now what they are."

"And the button off your coat, Fabian, these are hard things to understand."

"I have my theory about that, too, my dear, but I repeat, I will say nothing of my suspicions unless forced to, as it would sound malicious to many, and if the jury find that the girl died by her own hand it will be better for me to keep still on this point until I have more to back my suspicions."

"You think they will do that, Fabian?"

"Why, I pray a suicide. Well, I am hoping so, even though they be wrong. It will make matters less complicated."

"You think so, don't you, Fabian?"

He looked at her searchingly, pretending not to understand in order to give more time for thought.

"I think, Mercedes?"

"Why, that she committed suicide."

"Of that I am not so sure. But it is best for the public to think so if the court so decides. At least, it is best for the present."

She turned and closely studied his face.

"Why, then, you have strongly. What is it best for the public to think this if it is not true?"

"It is best so, for future results—until I can get out of here and prove my innocence to the world beyond a doubt."

She let go a little sigh of relief and, fondling his hand said:

"Fabian, should you tell me with your own lips that you committed this crime I would not believe it. I would say that you were bereft of your reason."

"And if I ever do admit such a thing, you may well think so," he laughed. "I greatly appreciate your faith, though, little one."

"Can't you prove your innocence without first getting out of here, Father?"

"Not very well. I shall go to work on my own theory to unearth or unravel the whole mystery if I am liberated."

"If you are liberated? Of course you will be," cried the girl in a frightened voice, "you, who are as innocent as a babe, must be proven so."

"I wouldn't be the first innocent man to hang, Mercedes. Since I have been pinned in this position and influenced to all the damning and trumped up evidence collected against me, as also the wild clamor of the public for my blood, I only wonder that more innocent persons are not strung up. I am rather surprised that any escape. It is simply astounding the evidence that can be found to damn a person, and when once suspicion falls upon his head. From my own point of view, everything seems strongly in favor of my conviction. You must see this, Mercedes."

"Oh, Fabian! You are breaking my heart! It—it cannot be! You must be ensnared or satisfactorily explain everything and establish your innocence beyond a doubt when the trial comes on."

"I wish, dear one, that I felt as sanguine as you do about the matter. But it seems as if fate is against me. It is the most unfortunate case of circumstantial evidence that an innocent man was ever called upon to face. So also think the fathers and Sister Agnes. I tell you all this, Mercedes, that you may not be too greatly shocked should the trial go against me. You must be too hopeful. There, don't sob, little girl—don't sob like that. I did not mean to grieve or alarm you, only to prepare you. There, dry your tears, you see I am only presenting the worst side. Many things may happen before the time set for trial."

"Maybe a letter will be found—that is, some acknowledgment or st—statement from her admitting that she intentionally destroyed herself," said Mercedes between her sobs.

"Perhaps so," answered the priest with a mental reservation. "And now, my dear, cheer up and do not take so seriously what I said. As I told you, I presented the worst side of the case. We shall think only of the brighter side."

"Yes, that is the way to do," she answered more cheerfully. The button dropped off your coat in the parlor. You have proven this."

"Possibly, in time."

"Then you have carried a handkerchief like that ever in your life, so Mother Agnes said."

"She is my sister. Her testimony won't count for much."

"But you say that you could kill her, either, or—"

"Yes, I did that, Mercedes, in a temper, with no meaning. Just as any one in a passion makes idle threats."

"The maid thought you meant it, though, and feared to leave her mistress alone in the house with you, so she said."

"Yes, that sounds bad for me. I must admit. But all men, my dear, don't bother, the jury will understand that," he said consolingly, yet with secret doubt.

"But she was tied to the bed—her hands were still tied with the rope when they found her. That proves that you—no one else than herself must have—" She broke off and looked up into his face questioningly.

"That is the hardest knot of all to undo, Mercedes, but it has been explained in my mind often enough to satisfy me."

"You will have the chance to make this all clear when you testify in your behalf."

"Yes, I can nuke known my theory of the whole thing, but more likely I shall only be laughed at. The public is no bitter, and having little to substantiate my theory, I shall be more severely ridiculed than ever for trying to fasten the crime, or a lasting suspicion, upon the dead, and that on also a bad position. Mercedes, still I expect in the end to get out of it."

"Dear me, but you are in an awful way, sure enough, Fabian."

"Yes, unusual for the present moment, but I must tell you that the fathers have employed a lawyer to look after my own best I made known to them my suspicions and they at once fell in with my views. My only hope, dear child, is that the public may get the evidence that he has been sent after. Did you see him? Can you tell, of many of these fellows. If I were only free to go after it myself I should be positive I could soon prove my innocence."

"Perhaps I could help you, Fabian. Why do you not send me after the evidence?"

"We will await developments, my dear, and see how things go. As to understanding me, then it will be necessary for me to confide in you. I shall need your assistance then, my true-hearted little girl."

"Then it may be too late."

"I think not. I will take to my judgment, dear one. My brain is not so sluggish during the excitement as I seem to feel here. You must in the meantime be brave and hopeful."

"I shall try to, for surely God would not let the life of an innocent good man, like yourself, Father Fabian, perish. I shall put my trust in Him. It seems when holy men like the fathers and Sister Agnes join public in unwise to denounce you so utterly. They should know that the fathers, the church, would uphold the innocent."

"Well, Mercedes, you know the protestant faith, and how they misjudge the Catholics, are ready to hide and cover up any crime, since we have the confessional, to judge and punish our sins than that which we find in this world. No, the fathers' faith in me is not strange. We have a general public which thinks that, believing me to have committed murder, we must conceal and take the same stand."

"Yes, I—I—" trembled me, dear Fabian, there is something which I have wished to talk with you about, but have hesitated to do so. Perhaps I should not now, but I—I—"

"And what did you tell her, little girl?"

"I said that I would leave it for you to decide. That your judgment I would trust rather than my own or that of any other. So, Fabian, if—if—you think it best to keep your vows of faith, why, I shall—I shall try not to blame you. I—I love you too greatly to stand in your way or do that which, under the circumstances, I believe from your head. I would not bring greater sorrow and disgrace upon you than you are much to bear," she concluded with half a sob.

He listened until she had finished without any attempt to interrupt her. Then looking straight into her troubled, tearful eyes with his great solemn ones, he asked:

"Mercedes, did you tell me that of my own accord?"

"Oh, indeed she did. I am not noble or good or fine enough to have taken this view of it. I fear I have been very selfish. But tell me, Fabian, have the fathers mentioned this matter to you?"

"Yes, oh yes—we have talked it over."

"And she is right, that I have spoken to you about this?"

"We have talked at length upon the subject last evening. She knows that I shall stand by my convictions."

"They—they all think you should—that is you should remain with the church, Fabian?"

"Of course."

"And you?"

"I cannot agree with them."

"You will still want to marry me?"

"My highest conception of bliss is that I may speedily free myself of these charges and make you my wife, just as we have planned, Mercedes."

"Oh, Fabian, Fabian, I am happy once again! I—I have fought and prayed against wishing that you might decide in this way, but—but you see, I cannot help my nature. While I prayed for strength to make the sacrifice, something way deep down in my heart kept crying out against giving you up. I suppose it is very selfish of me, but Oh, I love you so greatly! I cannot keep back or deny my nature's pleadings."

"You are not selfish, dear. Have I not repeatedly said that henceforth we should hearken to the voice of Nature instead of the man?"

"Yes, I had that in mind, Fabian, when I said that I would leave the matter to your judgment. Of course, the church will condemn me."

"Yes, both of us, in a way. That is the price we have to pay for our happiness. But it is worth the price, is it not?"

"Yes, Fabian, and a thousand crucifixions!"

Spoken like the girl that you are! We are on the right side of the question, Mercedes. With all due respect to my early teachings, I know that deep at the bottom of the natural law is the moral law, whatever they may argue against it. If we are right that law will reward us. If we are wrong, it will punish us, for there is no getting away from that. And even were the Bible or Catechism in existence, they would be no barrier for Nature's and the great laws of compensation keep right on about their business. The critics are constantly tearing down creeds to tatters, and generally knocking the bottom out of our fathers' faith, but they cannot touch Nature's laws. So, my dear, if nature directs us to marry, we have no duty to oppose or suppress its yearnings. God knows, I need your love!"

"Oh, Fabian, how you have comforted me!"

"I understand, Mercedes, that the public is much interested to know how this affair is coming on, and that is, in case I am acquitted. But this secret of ours we will keep. The fathers will give out no information, for they are playing the whole world know of my love for you, my queen! In fact, I have already been cast out, but since the good fathers have requested me to remain quiet on the subject for the present, I think it is best to do so. Father O'Brien believes it is better for my case that I do not stir up my interests for the future. They feel that the church is more in sympathy and support of me in this unfortunate affair. It is generous and kind of them to take this position under the existing circumstances, Mercedes."

"Indeed I agree with you, Fabian. How I wish we might wed and still keep our vows. But, no, I shall always love you and have a very high regard for the fathers for this, Fabian."

"And so you should, Mercedes. Father O'Brien said were it any other woman under the circumstances, Mercedes, he would have little patience with me."

"Dear, dear Father O'Brien! I am very weak and sinful. Mother Agnes knows this."

He smiled sadly. "I would to Heaven that all women were as sinful as you have not told me as yet about my sister. Is she not to be released? I hoped to see her with you this morning."

Mercedes dropped her eyes and answered confusedly:

"She—she is some easier, we think. But the—the—she did not feel her coming out. The pain in her chest is quite bad as yet."

"Poor child! I am sorry to worry over my trouble. You know, Mercedes, that I have been her pride and hope. And now to see me like this!"

"She may be better tomorrow and can come to you then," he said kindly, rising, "but that reminds me, I must go back now and look after her. I try to do so, that is, to help her, but she has got it into her head that I must not come near her greatly fear that she is offended with me."

The worshipping sister had collapsed fully, and that brain fever together with pneumonia was fast consuming her vitality. Mercedes did not have the heart to tell the prisoner. The next time would do, perhaps it were best to leave the task to Father O'Brien. Promising to send him upon her return, Mercedes left him and took her departure.

"Woe man ever so beset with trouble!" groaned the priest, when toward evening the news was carried to him that his sister was not expected to live but a few hours and her dying wish was that she might see her brother. While his lawyer and friends set themselves about getting permission for him so to see her bedside, Fabian sat anxiously and impatiently awaiting developments, his heart wrung with anguish, and at midnight that he found himself handcuffed and on his way back to the prison house.

His mind filled with pained and conflicting thoughts, he at last hurried up the steps and entered the house. Great was his surprise and joy when once inside he was met by the family physician who was just leaving, and informed him the fever was turning in the patient's favor. There was now hope that she might be saved. Nothing, however, must be said to alarm or worry her. As he entered the sick room Fabian found Mercedes standing at the foot of the bed. She greeted him with a weak little smile and turned to leave the room, but was requested by the prisoner to remain.

With a grateful, loving look bestowed upon her brother, the one who had been so near death reached for his hand.

"I am so glad that I cannot touch you," she whispered.

He stooped and fondly kissed her.

"I have a request to make of you before, before I go," she continued.

Fabian started from his position. He readily guessed her meaning.

"You must not fret, dear sister, you will soon be well. Get such foolish ideas out of your head. Mercedes is with me here very ill, but now you are all right."

"No you mistake—I am not ill. I—I am so happy. I fear this faintness means death."

"Then, no, don't distress yourself so. You are all wrong."

"This may be my last chance ever to speak with you, Fabian, the last time that you will see me alive."

"The doctor says that you must not talk, dear. You are exciting yourself unnecessarily."

"But I know best, Fabian. My time is short, indeed, and I want to see you before I go, to stay with the church."

He feared this was coming and not for the world would he have had it so. What to say in answer puzzled him sorely. He endeavored to equivocate.

"I may not—that is, I may not have any more," he faltered.

"True—that is true. But if you are acquitted promise me, Fabian, that you will return to the fold—that you will go there."

"I have pledged my faith elsewhere, you know."

"To her, you mean?"

"Yes."

"That is easily overcome. Mercedes is willing and ready to give you up. We have talked it over. She will not stand in my the word, to make me this promise. It is my last request."

The man, as he listened, showed signs of deep agitation. He really was almost disposed to be forced or claimed by her. He was being pulled as with a vice in two directions. The deep love he bore her would probably mean taking the life of one who had mothered and cared for him more than any man always. What should he do? What should he say? To tell her a falsehood was the only way out of it. Like all others he hesitated to do this. It seemed that a promise to the dead or dying should be held sacred. Could he make her such a promise? Just he said:

"Give me a moment to think about this, Agnes," and turned to the window.

As he did so he attempted to catch the eye of Mercedes, but she refused to meet his gaze, though he could see that she suffered intensely.

"My God, how many times more am I

(Continued on page fifteen.)

Women Avoid Operations

When a woman suffering from female trouble is told that an operation is necessary, it, of course, frightens her.

The very thought of the hospital, the operating table and the knife strikes terror to her heart.

It is quite true that these troubles may reach a stage where an operation is the only resource, but a great many women have been cured by Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound after an operation has been decided upon as the only cure.

The strongest and most grateful statements possible to make come from women who by taking made from native roots and herbs, have escaped serious operations, as evidenced by Miss Rose Moore's case, of 307 W. 36th St., N. Y. She writes:

Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound

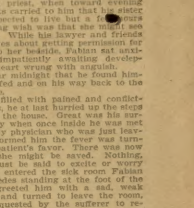
Dear Mrs. Pinkham:—"Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound has cured me of the very worst form of female trouble and I wish to express to you my deepest gratitude. I suffered intensely for two years so that I was unable to attend to my duties and was a burden to my family. I doctored and doctored with only temporary relief and constantly objecting to an operation which I was advised to undergo. I decided to try Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound; it cured me of the terrible trouble and I am now in better health than I have been for many years.

This and other such cases should encourage every woman to try Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound before she submits to an operation.



MISS ROSE MOORE

Mrs. Pinkham's Standing Invitation to Women

Women suffering from any form of female weakness are invited to promptly communicate with Mrs. Pinkham, at Lynn, Mass. From the symptoms given, the trouble may be located and the quickest and surest way of recovery advised.

THE CHICAGO LEDGER
35 YEARS OLD.
Published Every Saturday
BY
W. D. BOYCE CO.

All communications should be addressed to
THE CHICAGO LEDGER,
112, 114 DEARBORN ST.,
CHICAGO, ILLINOIS.

SUBSCRIPTION RATES.

Single subscriptions to the Chicago Ledger by mail $1.00 a year, 50 cents for six months, in advance. If not paid in advance, $1.50 a year, $1.00 for six months. Remittances should be made by Bank Draft, Registered Letter, Post-Office or Express Money Order, payable to The Chicago Ledger. Subscription price in Canada, $1.50 a year.

ADVERTISING.

Advertising rate $1.00 per Agate Line per insertion, for advertisements in The Chicago Ledger and Saturday Blade.

Entered at the postoffice at Chicago, Illinois, as second-class matter.

THE CHICAGO LEDGER
AND
THE SATURDAY BLADE
Average More Than 750,000
COPIES WEEKLY
PROVED CIRCULATION.

BACK NUMBERS.

Back numbers of the Ledger can be had by addressing this office. Always give the numbers desired, plainly written, according to style. Five cents per copy, and you will receive prompt attention. Price 5 cents per copy.

BEWARE OF STRANGERS.

The Ledger employs no subscription agents to solicit subscriptions, and every person working in that capacity is a fraud. No person is authorized to receive money for the Ledger unless he or she be well known in the city or town where they reside, and unless special agents to said effect have been used. We will not be responsible for any money paid out to anyone that will enable us to arrest and convict any person or persons receiving from ten to fifteen dollars each, on account of this swindle, claiming to be agents of the Ledger and thereby defrauding the people. Beware of strangers.

A lawsuit is the thief of time and money.

Happiness is often nothing but conceit.

And it is better to be a has-been than a never-was.

Thrift and stinginess are as similar as they are different.

If a man is incompetent he usually charges it up to bad luck.

Men with long heads are capable of using them on short notice.

Some men talk too loud and all women talk too much.

Freedom exists only in our minds. No man is really free.

Many a grafter has built his fortune on a steal foundation.

Some men attempt to do a main-tent stunt on a side-show ability.

A man thinks he's just as good as anybody when he goes to church in the rain.

Our idea of a hypocrite is a man who really admires his mother-in-law, but is too courtly to admit it to her face.

A New York court has decided that oysters are wild animals. Could an oyster kill an antelope by biting it in the neck?

Jim Hill has relented. After all the cruel things he has said in the past he is now willing to allow the Government to O. K. his bonds.

Senator Depew has gone to Europe, but he will not be missed, as the people have become accustomed to running this country without him.

A Topeka, Kan., man has been sent to jail five years for taking a drink of whisky. He ought to be free from the habit by the time he gets out.

Oklahoma is talking of sending a blind man to the Senate. We have had men there before who were blind to certain things, though otherwise their eyesight was fine.

A German inventor has discovered how to make the covering of the lead in the lead pencil out of pulp instead of wood. And he promises to drive the wooden article out of the market. By careful figuring he estimates that he can make each pencil for $.0028. It would be a great pleasure and surprise to mankind that has been paying five cents for the article to be able to step up to the counter, hand the clerk $.0028 and walk away with a nice pencil, or even to put down a cent and wait for the change. The human race certainly would be happier with cheaper pencils, and then, too, it would feel more secure with markers made of potato, for the man who got lost in the woods and was threatened with starvation could eat his pencil and feel much revived.

THE DEATH-KEY MYSTERY;

A Great Detective's Ruse.

By J. BRECKENRIDGE ELLIS.

[Copyright by W. D. Boyce Co.]

Begun in No. 25, June 22. Subscriptions can begin with that issue or back copies can be obtained from news stands, or our agents, or by mail from office of publication.

CHAPTER VII.

After dinner, Keeneyes and Jansen Moore spent the rest of the day in their hotel room.

Jansen Moore had his mustache cut off. It was, in fact, a severe blow to the self-complacency. He was sure he looked better with it, but he would show Sophia Le Brune that he was not vain.

Night came.

"Look," said Keeneyes, "let us go out to Whiteoak Farm."

"I would rather wait till morning when Sophia will be home," Jansen Moore objected.

"But my dear fellow," said the detective, "we are to pass the night in that large barn."

"Why?"

"Why? Did you not make an appointment with J. J. Zellers to meet him for interview you between ten and eleven?"

"No, I didn't," said Moore forcibly.

"Well, I made the appointment for you," the other smiled.

"But afterwards you wrote telling him not to come."

"And do you suppose that will make any difference in his plans?"

"Naturally."

"Well, it will not," returned the detective. "Then he will come there between ten and eleven to see me."

"Of course not, Moore; it never entered his head to come there between ten and eleven."

"I never wanted him to come, and you knew it."

"Then let's be going," said Keeneyes decidedly; "it is growing late."

Jansen Moore never came to the point of open rebellion, but his manner and attitude for almost unheard-of favors was too serious. But the great detective slave only grumble in the hearing of a tolerant master. The young man followed without taking any pains to conceal his unwillingness. The thought of escorting themselves in the barn was repugnant to his nature, but as a detective it was as natural a course of action as carrying a dinner pail and shoving in one's clothes, but to the young man who fancied himself a lover in love with the young lady of Whiteoak, the adventure as mapped out appeared mean and unworthy. What would Sophia think if she knew he was sneaking across the back-lot to the barn?

"You want to look out for that vicious horse," Moore whispered, as they climbed the gate.

"The horse that killed old Boliver Berting?" suggested the detective.

"I didn't say it killed him," returned Moore; "I suggested it was connected in inference."

"You'd better leave reasonable inferences to me," returned Keeneyes, displeased at hearing one of his pet phrases on another man's lips. "Don't make a noise, Moore, and don't get to contending. You come close behind me."

The night was extremely dark, but the big barn loomed up somberly at a short distance. They crossed the grassless lot, feeling their way cautiously over the cornrobs.

Moore whispered, "I wonder where that horse is?"

"I hear something following us," said Keeneyes in an undertone; "possibly the beast is looking for a place to rub his."

"Yes, I hear it," said Moore uneasily. "Let's break for the barn. I don't like this."

A threatening snort from the rear mingled with the pawing of agitated hoofs. "Yes," said Keeneyes quietly, "run."

They dashed toward the barn.

The horse came after them on a wild charge, whinnying and casting up its hind legs. As they reached the barn door the horse overtook them. It wheeled about to direct operations upon them with its forces from the rear.

Fortunately the barn door stood open. The men rushed within and closed it.

Instantly there ensued a thundering succession of terrific blows upon the quaking boards.

"Is there a loft?" panted Moore; "let me climb to it."

"Here's a ladder," said Keeneyes chuckling, but breathless. "Would anything along that line suit you?"

"Give it to me," cried Moore.

The ladder was nailed to the wall. Moore ascended. "Come on," he cautiously called; "it holds up to the loft, sure enough."

Keeneyes followed. "Ah," he said with satisfaction, "this is delightful, plenty of hay! We ought to have a splendid night's rest up here."

The pain of the horse's hoofs against the barn door continued its flood of sound.

"Look," said Moore frantically, "we have a sweet lullaby. Mr. Zellers, I wish you would tell me why we ever came to this barn. What did we hope to do that we are in the loft?"

"Do you think I have come here without a reason?" asked Keeneyes with dignity.

"Why, no; but I would like to know what the reason is," Moore evaded him.

"Now, Moore, remember our compact; I am to keep you advised of all the facts in the case; you are to do your own reasoning on the why and wherefore. So please don't ask me the reason for anything. We are here; that's a fact I am handing you. As for the rest, you must deduce them for yourself from the fact as given. I assure you we are not here for fun."

"No, I'm sure I'm not," growled Moore.

"Then let us be quiet," said Keeneyes. "Then let us cast ourselves upon this hay and seek what slumber is coming."

Moore lay down, but he did not sleep for some time.

His wakefulness, however, made his slumber the more profound when it finally overtook him.

He was roused from unconsciousness, by feeling strong hands grappling with his arms.

"Hello!" muttered Jansen Moore sleepily, "what kind of a fact is this you're handling me?"

"Shut up!" said a strange voice in good American. "If you make any racket we'll knock you in the head."

Moore was thrilled with alarm. He sought to spring up, but two pairs of arms overpowered him.

A lantern stood upon the loft floor, but Moore was blindfolded and could see nothing.

"Where's that there rope?" asked the first speaker.

"Here it is," the second captor answered.

"Then why don't you use it?" the first responded scruffily. "What are you waiting for? You don't have to save that to get home with. It's for the use of the entertainments."

The other bound Jansen Moore's arms and legs with the rope.

"What does this mean?" demanded Moore as loudly as he dared.

"It don't mean nothing," said the first speaker. "We don't mean nothing except to do, so we've taken a notion to truss you up. We thought it might intrust you and we knowed it would us."

The lantern was extinguished.

When the men's hands released him, Moore tried to wriggle from the spot and was discouraged on finding that he had been securely fastened to one of the uprights of the loft. His was powerless, except to roll and yell. This he did, but when the captains were safely away. In the meantime, sublimate silence seemed best to him.

"What do you fellows want?" he demanded.

"I want to go," said the first.

"Me, same," said the second. Moore heard them climb their way toward the head of the ladder.

Moore cried out, "I know you, Mr. Jones, and I object to this exclusion from the suppostion that one of his captors was to be left behind."

"I am glad you do," said the first speaker; "my name is Jones, sir."

"So is mine," said the other, who seemed in the best of humor. "Pleased to meet you, Mr. Tied-up-in-the-hay-pleated to meet you, sir."

The men went down the ladder. Moore heard them leave the barn. There was no sound of the vicious horse.

Moore whispered, "Mr. Zellers!"

No answer.

It was intensely dark in the loft.

Moore was deeply perplexed. Where was Keeneyes? Had the men first overcome that astute detective? If not, Keeneyes must have slipped away before their arrival. Why had he slipped away? Could he have known the men were coming? Was it at Zellers' connivance or desire that Moore lay helplessly chafing in his bonds? On the other hand, had anything serious happened to his companion? Keeneyes was a very light sleeper; he would not suffer himself to be bound without some sort of resistance. Perhaps he even now lay upon the hay, stunned by a cruel blow. It was even possible that he had been assassinated.

It would have been some relief to Jansen Moore could he have felt anger at Keeneyes over this predicament. It was all Keeneyes' fault that they had come to the barn. Still, Moore could not be angry at a man who perhaps lay dead almost within reach of his hand. With what force he might command, he waited for the dawn.

At last the morning came. No lover ever hailed the arrival of his heart's delight with more rapture than Jansen Moore hailed and greeted the pale, dusty light that stole through the crevices of the loft and made the interior dimly apparent. As the morning were on, it became evident that Keeneyes was not in the loft; or, if he were, his head had been effectually concealed by the hay.

Moore was stiff and sore, but he had not summoned the resolution to shout for help. In the first place, not a sound save his own ears save that of some fowls in the lot below and of mice scurrying along the walls, and of pigeons upon the roof. He remembered how far the barn was from the house, and he did not think it possible his voice could be heard by Mrs. Le Brune.

Moreover, it was inevitable that whenever he should be found, the question would confront him: "But why were you in the barn at such an hour of the night?" What would people think when he confessed that he did not know why he was in the barn?

"It is a most deplorable situation," Moore reflected. "Still I cannot let the day sing by without using for assistance; but I will wait as long as possible. Perhaps Keeneyes may not yet be dead. He may be fled from my captors; in that case, he will deliver me without exciting the farmhands to a search."

At last Moore heard footsteps in the barn lot. They were approaching nearer. "Now is the time to call for help," thought Moore, but he did not find his voice.

Several people approached the barn. They were conversing quietly, as if Whiteoak Farm were a place where nothing startling ever happened. A man's voice mingled with that of three women. The three women entered the barn and stood directly under the head of the loft where Moore lay a helpless prisoner.

CHAPTER VIII.

Moore did not-strain at his bonds, because he had already chafed his limbs to no avail by struggling in the ropes. And, although he was very stiff and sore he lay directly beneath him as he lay in the loft; he still restrained himself from calling for help.

It was not because he feared that the three enemies or had had anything to do with the disappearance of Keeneyes. The two of the newcomers were ladies banished that supposition.

Moreover, as the young man listened attentively, he became aware of the fact that the man of the party in the barn was Keeneyes.

Yes, there could be no doubt of it; Keeneyes was talking to the ladies in the most natural and quiescent of voices, and the ladies were Mrs. Le Brune and her daughter.

Evidently Sophia Le Brune had arrived that morning as expected.

Did they know that Moore was lying bound hand and foot immediately above their heads? The young man's blood boiled with rage against Keeneyes, and in earnestness to see the young lady who had enchanted his heart Ted Jansen Moore would not subject himself to the humiliation of a discovery by making an outcry. Accordingly he composed himself to wait for the departure of the ladies, when no doubt Keeneyes would ascend to his deliverance.

In the meantime, as the reader is not bound to the loft, but in the hay, he may invite him down to the lower part of the barn, where he may stand upon solid ground. Here he will find Keeneyes conversing easily with Mrs. Le Brune and Miss Sophia Le Brune, and he will see at a glance that Jansen Moore is gnashing his teeth overhead.

The party of three stood in a sort of hallway that extended from front to rear of the barn, the door at the front end stood open. On one side were the stalls, on the other, feed-bins.

Keeneyes walked to the ladder that led to the loft and said, "This reminds me of when I was a boy. I used to climb barn ladders and breathe the fragrance of the hay. Now I wouldn't climb it for a cup just for the exercise, would you?"

"Of course not, Mr. Moore," said Mrs. Le Brune.

It will be remembered that as Mrs. Le Brune thought Keeneyes was there for Keeneyes, Keeneyes had agreed to assume her christian name. Moore, however, who knew the truth, had who had been wired to keep up the deception, bit her lip to keep from laughing at the idea of Keeneyes, and after so severely ridiculing Jansen Moore in her letter he was somewhat surprised to appear before her mother to tolerate Keeneyes. Moore's mother's eyes Keeneyes was Jansen Moore.

"Well, I'll not go up the ladder just now," said Keeneyes giving it a kick for the benefit of Jansen Moore's listening ears. "As you are very well equipped, I am not requested you to come to the loft to give your self the trouble of any aid in climbing. I may not go up into the loft at all to-morrow; there's plenty of time for that."

"Then I shall not go up, either," said Mrs. Le Brune coldly. She recalled Sophia's demonstrations of concern she suspected that Keeneyes, whom she supposed to be Moore, had brought there more as a pretext to bring her daughter to see him in her daughter's society as much as possible.

"In the absence of Keeneyes," said that detective quietly, "I am left to conduct this case; not for long, of course, but during this day at least."

"It is very unfortunate," said Mrs. Le Brune, "that Mr. Keeneyes, whom we expressly engaged, should go away and leave our affairs in your hands, Mr. Moore. It was Keeneyes that we wanted."

"Mother," said Sophia, "I am sure it is for the best. Mr. Keeneyes would not desert us without sufficient reason."

"Very neatly put," cried Keeneyes; "and I assure you Keeneyes would not have gone away had he not known that I can do as well as he what must be done today. Keeneyes was never known to desert his post. And he will continue to fail to penetrate to the very core of a mystery, the very core, madam, and count the seeds, madam. So rest at ease. Where he is now is no matter. He will be here tomorrow. I promise you on the honor of Jansen Moore, madam. But now to business."

"Yes," said Mrs. Le Brune.

"Madam, Keeneyes has in his possession some picture taken of the farmhouse and its interior at the time of the unhappy death of your uncle, Sollyer Baring. One of the pictures shows the interior of the kitchen, the room where Phil Deedum says he saw the corpse, and the room in which nobody else but Phil Deedum saw the corpse."

"Well?"

"Well, madam, Keeneyes pointed out to me with the picture something most amazing is to be seen lying upon the floor."

"I remember that picture very well," said Mrs. Le Brune, "but there is nothing amazing upon the floor except Mr. Phil Deedum's walking-stick."

"Oh, pardon me, madam," said the detective smugly. "Keeneyes showed me, lying not far from the spot where Phil Deedum says he discovered the corpse, a large house-key."

"Oh, yes, mother," said Sopha, "don't you remember that key?"

"No, if I noticed it I have forgotten. But there is nothing amazing about an iron key, is there, Mr. Moore?"

"Nothing at all," said Keeneyes. "In the opinion of Keeneyes, that is the key to your uncle's safety."

"Mr. Moore, you speak enigmas."

"Why, thank you, madam," said Keeneyes, very much pleased. "Thank you. It is not my wish to discuss that key and its bearings upon the case. But it is necessary to find that key."

"I do not know what key it was," said Mrs. Le Brune, "and I wish I could have told you that without coming down here to the barn."

"No, pardon me," returned Keeneyes; "I hope to find there the key to the door of the key. Now Miss Sopha, you know nothing of the key?"

"I don't know what key it was, Mr. Zellers."

"You mean Mr. Moore," Keeneyes corrected her.

"Oh," said Sopha, concealing a smile, "pardon me, Mr. Moore."

Keeneyes twirled his mustache boastfully. He asked, "Was no inquiry made for that key at the time of the tragedy?"

"I never heard it mentioned."

"Nobody tried to find how it happened to be lying there upon the floor?"

"No one thought of it, I suppose," remarked Mrs. Le Brune, "that they judged it had dropped, perhaps, by accident."

"Ah, yes," said Keeneyes, smiling again; "dropped, that is the way. Very good, Excellent. Now, is no key missing about your house, madam?"

"None."

"Then that brings us to the barn," cried Keeneyes briskly and loudly. "Madam, I thought that key too big and heavy to be a house key. Now I insist upon your looking about you in the barn to see if missing to any of these locks or padlocks?—a key that has been gone long—or to say that you know that nobody ever thinks about it any more?"

Mrs. Le Brune shook her head.

"I wish the farmhands were here," said Keeneyes. "You will see they have taken the horse-trainer to town to have his ribs mended since he broke them yesterday. Now, for instance, this huge lock on the corn-bin, it seems half-choked up with dust."

"We never lock that."

"Is there a key?"

"There hasn't been since we moved here."

"How long ago?"

"About three years ago."

"Then that key in the picture might be the key belonging to this lock?"

"There is nothing to prove that, Mr. Moore."

"Still it is a possibility, isn't it, madam?"

"Almost anything is a possibility," said Mrs. Le Brune peevishly.

"Why, thank you for the admission. Then it is possible that the key in the picture belonged to this lock?"

"I do not remember having seen the key in the picture——"

"It was a large, heavy, iron key."

"Then I suppose it might have belonged to this lock."

"Good," cried Keeneyes. "Thank you. I am delighted that you grant so much. It is a reasonable inference, then, that that key belonged down here at the barn. Now, why should it have been up at the house, and why should there in the kitchen on the floor? And in particular, why upon the very day of the murder? Now, does anyone know that barn key was kept customarily upon the kitchen floor, do you?"

"I think about it," said Mrs. Le Brune, displeased at the other's domineering manner. "I have do not know that it was the barn key; and I intend to have nothing more to do with this matter until Mr. Keeneyes comes back, for he is the detective we have employed——"

"And you could not have employed a better one, I assure you."

"Sopha, child, take her mother, "let us go to the house."

"I trust you will not object to my hunting for the key," said Moore.

"If you do confine your search to the barn and key, I do not object to anything you may do," said the lady.

"Then please do not let the men turn out that vicious horse when they come back from town. Let it be kept fastened in the back pasture. And you need not call me to dinner, Mrs. Le Brune," added Keeneyes, waving his hands and twirling his mustache as boldly as he dared; he was afraid to tweak it too hard, because it was a false mustache, assumed for Jansen Moore's benefit.

When the ladies were gone, Keeneyes climbed the ladder, softly singing to himself, as if unaware that Jansen Moore lay bound hand and foot, awaiting his coming.

CHAPTER IX.

It is not to be supposed that Jansen Moore wished for Keeneyes with a spirit of fond fearance.

Even if the young man had not been chafed by the ropes that tied him relentlessly to the upright in the barn loft, the being left waiting to see what Keeneyes' judgment would have made him sore enough.

He had heard the conversation of Keeneyes with Mrs. Le Brune and Sopha. He had been fatalized with images of that young lady without being able to verify the impressions of memory by actual sight. All his inconvenience and limitations he placed at Keeneyes' account, and when that imperturbable gentleman appeared at the top of the ladder, Jansen Moore tightly closed his mouth and eyes and lay mute.

When he perceived Keeneyes softly exclaimed, "what is this before me? A recumbent figure, bound hand and foot, like Jansen Moore, is it not?"

"Yes, certainly it is," said Moore gruffly. "Will you release me?"

"Why ought I to know?" demanded Keeneyes, as he climbed out into the barn. The ropes were precisely severed and Moore sprang to his feet, shaking himself.

"You knew all about this," said Moore petulantly. "You knew that a big outrage perpetrated, you connived at it."

"Nonsense!" returned the detective. "You are in a temper, Jansen Moore, and your circumstances is quite natural. I knew nothing of your being tied up in such a fashion. How did you do it?"

"You cursed fool," muttered Moore sullenly, as he sank upon the hay to rest.

"Oh, I suppose I know," returned Keeneyes. "Why, there may be something in that." As soon as I saw you lying there I inferred the truth, Jansen Moore."

"Then what is the truth?" demanded the young man, still rubbing his stiffened wrists.

"I will elucidate," said Keeneyes cheerfully. "Shall I begin at the beginning?"

"I don't care where you begin," said Moore impatiently. "There is a clew to that place where I was so wilely set upon and outraged. If there is law in the land I'll be righted in it."

"My dear fellow," said Keeneyes gently, "there is law in the land, and there is also a Legislature, so likely enough the law won't do you any good. But I will tell you a few words as is told, and I assure you I have nothing to do with the outrage committed upon you. Now, what do you call it?"

"Why, I simply call it a fact. It interests me as a fact. It assumes no moral significance in my eyes."

"I dare say you would see a moral significance in it if it had been you tied up here all night and not Jansen Moore."

"I dare say I would," said Keeneyes; "but you see, it wasn't me, and I'm not going to discuss affairs cheerfully. When I left you last night you were sleeping as soundly and as softly as a baby."

"Why did you go away?"

"Yes, you have a right to ask that, since I am to give you every fact in this mystery case. Well, madam, I slipped away to search for the iron key."

"What iron key?" Moore asked peevishly. "That iron key you were so stupidly explained, "which the picture in the old newspaper represented as lying on the kitchen floor near the spot——"

"Yes, yes," Moore interposed peevishly. "Mr. Keeneyes, "where Phil Deedum swore he discovered the corpse of Sollyer Baring."

"Yes, I understand," said Moore, "I remember that a point you've always made of that key."

"To you, Mr. Keeneyes, "has that key no importance?"

"None whatever," said Moore promptly. "Why did you go to find it, Mr. Zellers? What can you do with it?"

"But, my friend, I do not want to find it."

"You just now, you slipped away from me last night to hunt for it."

"Yes, and I found it, but had no desire to find it."

"Then why did you hunt for it?"

"That I must leave you to infer. Remember, I hand you the facts and you are to do the reasoning upon them."

"Mr. Zellers, is it really a fact that you were hunting for something that you did not want to find?"

"Upon my honor, Moore, that is the absolute fact."

"Then I infer," said Moore, "that you either had some plot in your hands than you knew what to do with, or else you simply wanted a pretext to get away to leave me at the mercy of thugs."

"Neither proposition does credit to me, or you either," said Keeneyes, "and both are erroneous."

"Well, I care nothing about the key," said Moore. "What I want to know is, who tied me up here and outraged me?"

"As I was saying," remarked Keeneyes, "I went to search for the iron key, which I expected was not there. This morning the horse-trainer went early and the vicious horse was put in the back pasture and the horse-trainer was carried to town, as he was to be mended. Then Miss Sopha Le Brune came in on the morning train. It was necessary to find if either of the ladies, Miss Sopha or her mother, knew about the key."

"So you led them down here, yes, I heard you talking," said Moore. "You knew all the time that I was right overhead, didn't you?"

"I suspected it. I had left you in the loft; I hadn't seen you come out."

"You were here at Whitcomb Farm all night, yet didn't see those ruffians come here to tie the barn to overpower me?—and they carried a lantern, too," cried Moore.

"Just so," said Keeneyes. "But remember I was most delicately occupied. I was looking for the iron key in the house. Mrs. Le Brune is a light sleeper and I had to be very cautious——"

"Surely, Mr. Zellers, you didn't break into the house?" exclaimed the other.

"I entered it," said Keeneyes. "Gentlemen in my profession do not speak of breaking into houses. A detective is like a summer breeze; he comes and he goes as he lists. But the key is not in the house. I am quite sure of it. I was delighted not to find it."

"But why didn't you come back to the barn this morning to see what had become of me?"

"The horse-trainer and the farmhands were very active after daybreak and I was obliged to keep away from the barn lest I bring them down upon you. And after the train came, it was necessary to make myself particularly disagreeable to Mrs. Le Brune."

"Why so?"

"Because she thinks I am Jansen Moore, and Miss Sopha had written to her what an unpleasant character Jansen Moore is. I tried to carry out the part as Miss Sopha had described me, or as nearly as she had described you. I am quite sure Mrs. Le Brune despises me heartily as Jansen Moore."

Jansen Moore groaned.

"Why, what's the trouble?" Keeneyes heartily. "Don't you see the consequences? When you return to the house, Miss Le Brune, who has already mistaken you for me, will sensitively resent your coldness. She will endeavor to prevent my being with Miss Sopha, and this will throw you and the young lady together. You will give you an opportunity to prove to the young lady that you are not the disagreeable, unpleasant skull she took you to be at thanks, Missouri, by which time I am telling you a great many of the time you were thinking dark thoughts of me."

"Why, there may be something in that," cried Moore.

"Something in it? Everything is in it. It gives you a chance to act up for yourself. Of course to the old lady you'll have to continue to be Keeneyes, but to the young lady, who knows better, you will unfold yourself in your own unfortunate but not wholly unworthy."

"Will you go to the house now," said Moore eagerly, "and try it."

"You will have a difficult part to play, Moore," said Keeneyes thoughtfully. "Do you think you will prove yourself equal to it?"

"I think I will," said Moore. "Come on."

"But, my friend, interested I am in knowing who tied you up last night?"

"Oh, I had forgotten all about that," said Moore with a faint laugh. "Look here, Mr. Zellers, isn't it a fact that J. J. James had been down?"

"I infer that, but you may infer what you please."

"And his object is to drive me away—to scare me off from this mystery case?"

"It is a reasonable inference."

"Nobody can drive me away but Sopha Le Brune," returned Moore. "But if J. J. James sent those rowdies out here, he must have known that I was in the house you would let him in my name; so after all, Mr. Zellers, you are the first cause of my indignities."

"Not at all," said Keeneyes. "Whenever a man undertakes to find the first cause of things, he behind him look into his own heart."

"What do you mean?"

"I mean," said Keeneyes, "that you should never have sought to match your wits in a warfare of intrigue with Jansen Moore."

"And I speak of her and think of her as Sopha," returned Moore, "and I tell you I say I'll miss her soon enough. Come, let's go to the house and have our first scene in this little sorrowful——"

CHAPTER X.

Keeneyes descended the ladder from the barn loft.

Jansen Moore came down more stiffly, but when he was upon the ground he felt his strength renewed.

"We will slip out by the rear," said Keeneyes, "and approach the farmhouse on a detour, in order that they may not know you have been sleeping in their barn all night."

"Sleeping!" repeated Moore ironically, but he said no more.

It was after eleven o'clock when they reached the country road without having been seen.

"I told them," said Keeneyes, as they entered the farmyard, "that you would not come back till night."

"I know them better," said Moore recklessly.

"Remember Miss Sopha knows you to be Moore, the man she despises; while her mother thinks you are Keeneyes, the man she admires."

"Now, Mr. Zellers," Moore remonstrated, "I cannot imagine that Sopha despises me. I believe when she knows me better she will find that she has misjudged me. Come, let us drive for its deserves."

They approached the farmhouse. It appeared deserted.

In answer to their knock, Mrs. Le Brune opened the door. She was surprised.

"Good morning, once more," said Keeneyes jauntily.

Mrs. Le Brune bowed constrainedly and said, turning to Moore, "Ah, Mr. Keeneyes, you have returned to the house, I see."

"Unforeseen developments," said Moore, "have obliged Keeneyes to return."

They followed the lady of the house into the parlor. She asked eagerly, "Do you think you have found something pertaining my uncle's death?"

"Why, I think we have unearthed, Keeneyes?" asked Keeneyes of Moore.

Moore looked around the room and looked down with the faintest shade of a bow on finding Moore.

"Why, I think," said Moore, trying to assume the air Keeneyes had so often worn to his annoyance, "those portraits we have said means are not to be speculated upon. Mrs. Le Brune, I have told you, Moore," he added, addressing Keeneyes in a patronizing manner, "until the time is ripe for action."

Keeneyes grinned, and Mrs. Le Brune gave him a perplexed look. She said to Jansen Moore, "You are quite right, Mr. Keeneyes."

Sopha Le Brune with difficulty concealed a scornful smile.

"Now, my dear fellow," said Keeneyes, "I see a piano of my favorite make. Who plays?"

"Sopha," said Moore.

"Yes," said Sopha Le Brune without any hesitation about it.

"I am going to ask a favor," said Keeneyes, "The fact is, Mrs. Le Brune, Keeneyes has been a long time without any place looking for an old iron key, which he fancies may have been left in the yard some years ago."

"Then you should go," said Mrs. Le Brune gaily. "I know every Mr. Keeneyes in this case, and whatever he wants done must be done. Now, you will please act with them, Mr. Moore, if Keeneyes says so."

"I do not," said Jansen Moore to the detective. "Run along, my friend, and find that key; all depends upon it."

"Then," said Moore harshly, "I don't like to be wandering over the ladies' premises since, as Keeneyes says, there is a proper thing. Miss Sopha, won't you chaperone me? Come and stroll, a leg of your."

Sopha would like to have gone, but as she had written her mother that she despised Moore, she had not been prepared for this Keeneyes was Moore, she hesitated in answering.

"Upon my word," cried Mrs. Le Brune, becoming a little angry, "you are rude, Mr. Moore, I am of a more suitable age. I will show you about the yard. Sopha, play Mr. Keeneyes a tune while I am gone. Come, sir."

"Mother," said Sopha hastily. "I do not think I have any need for you to go with Mr.—for you to go with him. Stay while he looks for the key."

"Well, I can't be prowling about alone," said Keeneyes, twirling his mustache. "I should feel like an intruder, madam,

(Continued on page fourteen.)

WE WILL SEND TO ANY RESPONSIBLE PERSON A GENUINE

VICTOR TALKING MACHINE

for two days' trial in their own home

ABSOLUTELY FREE

together with our choice of the best selected Victor 10-inch Records of your own selection, amounting to not over $10.00 ADDITIONAL, NO C.O.D. PAYMENT, NO SECURITY.

You pay nothing in advance for the Victor and if you are not entirely pleased with it, after two days' time trial you can return it at our expense. If you have been paying $25.00 or $30.00 for a Victor, or any other high-grade talking machine, you can well appreciate the wonderful volume, tone and sweetness of pleasure in store for you, as it is to be ahead of all other machines.

OUR EASY PAYMENT PLAN at lowest cash prices, makes it possible for you to own a Victor. If you've been saving up for a Victor, or any other high-grade talking machine, you can well appreciate the wonderful volume, tone and sweetness of pleasure in store for you, as it is to be ahead of all other machines.

LET THIS PAPER BOOM BIG WHITE US NOW, and receive a Victor by return mail. Pay one-tenth of the purchase price on receipt of goods, as C.O.D., in seven prices, big descriptive catalogue free.

RUDOLPH WURLITZER CO.,

320 E. Fourth Street, - CINCINNATI, Ohio.

Leather Watch Fob With Your Initial on It.

Over 8 inches long.

This Fob is a beauty, made of fine, long, lustrous leather, with a handsome gilt initial on it, to monogram. It can be worn as a watch fob, chatelaine or card case. Comes in assorted colors. You may have any initial you wish. We have sold hundreds of thousands of these fobs to boys, girls, men and women, and they are suitable for old and young, during all seasons of the year. Every one is pleased with them. Remember, we guarantee the fobs to be all embroidered, attractive and far better value than you can buy at any store even at double the price. We especially need your name and address at once, as we have a special proposition for you. Money back if not satisfactory. Send 12 cents in stamps (coin preferred) for a sample fob and your name and address and mailed plainly. Don't delay; write now—today—or you may forget it.

12 Cents in Stamps

STAR MONTHLY 133 Hunter St., OAK PARK, ILL.

DOCTOR'S FOOD TALK

Selection of Food One of the Most Important Acts in Life.

Adam, doctor says: "Our health and physical and mental happiness are to large ly under our personal control that the proper selection of food should be, and is one of the most important acts in life.

"On this subject, I may say that I know of no food equal in digestibility, and more powerful in point of nutriment, than the Grape-Nuts, four heaping teaspoons of which is sufficient for the cereal part of a meal, and experience demonstrates that the user is perfectly nourished from one meal to another.

"I am convinced that the extensive and general use of high class foods of this character would increase the term of human life, add to the sum total of happiness and very considerably improve society in general. I am free to mention the food, for I personally know of its value."

Grape-Nuts food can be used by babes in arms, or adults. It is ready cooked, can be served instantly, either cold with cream, or with hot water or hot milk poured over. All sorts of puddings and fancy dishes can be made with Grape-Nuts. The food is concentrated and very economical, for four heaping teaspoons are sufficient for the cereal part of a meal. Read the little book, "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs. "There's a Reason."

Proper Place for Them.

"Yes, sir," remarked the self-made man, "brains come in ahead every time."

"Of course they come in a head," rejoined the cynical person. "I never heard of any one with brains in his feet."

Ladies, Preserve Your Youthful Appearance.

Madame Mignette's Beauty Cream and Skin Food removes every defect, spot, freckle, pimple, blemish or wrinkle, leaving the skin soft, clear and smooth. It is perfectly harmless and will not injure the most delicate skin. It preserves and brings back the youthful glow to the face and ruddiness to the cheeks, preserving it in this condition until extreme old age. This preparation has been used for years and hundreds are now using it and are more than delighted with the results.

Send us ten (10) cents for formula which you can have filled at any drug store at a very small cost. Do not delay, but write at once. Box 491, Bladensville, Pa.

Nothing New.

"I see that Gruet has taken a wife."

"Well, it won't be the first thing he has taken which doesn't agree with him."

Billy—What's the matter with you, Johnny?

Johnny—I've had so much lemonade that every time I swallow a piece of candy I can hear it splash.

An Improvement.

Weary Walker—De world's all wrong. Tired Tatters—Wot's eatin' youse now? Weary Walker—Ef I'd 'a' had de makin' uv it I'd 'a' made all de roads runnin' down hill.

Might Accept It.

"He is out looking for an honest dollar."

"But I notice he glances around occasionally to see if one of the other kind is trying to flirt with him."

In After Years

Anxious Mother—Little Bobbie cries for the moon every night. I don't know what to do about it.

Old Doctor—Oh, he'll outgrow that in time. When he grows up he will forget the moon and want the earth.

Hard Luck.

"My wife rides my pockets every night."

"Just think of the poor Mormon."

"Yes; his wives must have a rifle match."

BOUND TO GET IT.

"What in the world are you going to do with that diving suit, Biggs?"

"Going to spend the Fourth in a nice, cool, quiet spot."

Curiosity.

Mrs. Pyke (in carriage with her husband)—George, who was that woman who just passed us and who gave you such a peculiar look?

Mr. Pyke—That's just what she will ask about you the next time I see her. Women are such curious creatures!

Possible Explanation.

An old hen was pecking at some stray carpet tacks in the back yard.

"Now what do you suppose that fool hen is eating those tacks for?" said Jones.

"Perhaps," rejoined his better half, "she is going to lay a carpet."

Might Drop Dead.

Oh, if I could only find
In my last summer's vest
A musty old two-dollar bill—
Well, you can guess the rest.

Knew the Effect.

"Were you ever in a railroad wreck?"

"No, but I have come home with goods three shades lighter than the sample my wife sent down with me to have matched."

A Dainty Little Maid.

Every one ought to have her. She is dressed in pretty colors and changes the color of her skirt herself when it is going to rain. She indicates when it is wise to take an umbrella or when you can do without. She is the simplest and best of barometers. She is an ornament, a good seller for agents, a pretty gift, a good business souvenir and useful to any one. She or one of her sisters comes postpaid with full directions for only 10 cents. W. P. Randolph & Co., 78 Dearborn St., Chicago.

Might Have Been Worse.

Links—I don't see that the hair-restorer has done you any good. You haven't a hair on your head.

Winks—Yes, but just think how much worse it might have been if I had never used the remedy.

In Its Proper Place.

John Bull—Oh, you Irish, you're forever putting the cart before the horse, don't ye know.

Mike Dunn—Yes, but we also put the "h" there.

Avoided Injury.

"Are you the gentleman who compiled that list of household remedies that every family should lay in against possible accidents on the Fourth?" asks the man with the mayonnaise whiskers approaching the desk of the answers-for-the-eager editor.

"I believe I am, sir," replies that individual.

"Then, sir, I wish to compliment you upon your foresight. Your advice saved my family from any injuries at all."

"I am glad to hear that."

"Yes, sir. By the time I had bought the arnica and the camphor and the bandages and the listerine and the first aid for the injured packages and all the rest of the stuff I didn't have any money left to buy fireworks with."

Hardest Part Is Over Now.

"Gladys, have you written your graduating essay on 'Modern Humanitarianism?'"

"No, but I've selected that for a subject, pa, and now I've only got to find out what it is."

The Important Thing.

Myrtle—Has your sister come to any conclusion about her essay for the commencement exercise?

Caroline—Yes. She is going to write it on blue paper to match her dress.

Dyspeptic Wail.

Ever since our marriage
I'm unhappy, don't you see,
For wifey does the cooking,
And her cooking's doing me.

Got Something Back.

When she decided—that's my girl—
To break love's airy fetters
She wrote, "I can't return your love,
But can your old love letters."

Nice Distinction.

"Do you think that man descended from monkeys?"

"Some descended, and some merely dress differently."

Somewhat Different.

Blox—I hear you have been visiting friends in the country.

Knox—You have got it wrong. I was visiting relatives.

PROPOSING ON JULY FOURTH.

Augustus—"Only say that you will be mine and——"

The Boys—"Drop it over quick, and we'll give 'em a salute!"

"Nothing in the world shall (Boom!) come——"

"Between us!"

JOLLITY

He Couldn't Understand.

"O," said the fair young thing, when the cannon crackers began to boom and the rockers to cleave the air, "these terrific noises always frighten me half to death. I always feel as though I must cling to some strong, sturdy protector, and——"

"How foolish!" observed the practical young man, whose name, by the way, was Lunkhead. "There isn't the slightest danger if you do not go too close to the explosives. Women are continually scaring themselves over a lot of trivial——"

But the fair young thing had pouted and excused herself, saying that she saw a friend across the lawn.

Later, in the rockets and red glare, Mr. Lunkhead saw her clinging like the ivy to the oak against a stalwart young man who seemed to be thoroughly convinced that she was frightened out of a year's growth.

No Job for Him.

"Bleaker—Well, old man, how does the political situation strike you?

Seaken—Huh! I've been waiting for a political situation to strike me for the past twenty years, but there seems to be nothing doing.

Jones' Experience on a Hot Fourth of July.

Committed Himself.

"My dear Miss Oldegurl" says Mr. Batch, "I understand that you have sued me for breach of promise."

"Yes, sir," crisply responds Miss Oldegurl.

"But is there not some mistake?"

"Mistake? No, indeed!"

"Why, you know, I never even mentioned matrimony to you."

"O, yes, you did."

"When and where?"

"At the Fourth of July exercises."

"At the Fo——"

"Yes, sir. Didn't you read Patrick Henry's address during the program?"

"I did, but——"

"And didn't you shout: 'Give me liberty or give me death?' ——"

"Of course, but I——"

"And wasn't the goddess of liberty?"

The Village Gossips.

Silas H[illegible] every Tuesday and Thursday [illegible] "ride-an-eight" with the ladies' sewing [illegible] in this town.

City Dude—Indeed! And what do they rip up?

Silas Hardacre—Carpet rags, pedigrees and the absent members.

In the Wrong Place.

Chapleigh—I say druggist, can you—aw—give me something to—aw—brighten me up, doncher know?

Druggist—You're in the wrong place, young man. This is a drug store, not a night school.

Just Like Him.

"He is the most contrary man you ever saw."

"Really?"

"Yes. Why, he wouldn't attend his own funeral if he thought his friends desired him to be present."

At the Kennels.

"My, but that dog has an awfully short tail."

"Yes; but he's got a long pedigree."

Their Restraint.

Percy (electrically)—Bah, Jove! All th' girls around here smile at me.

Jack—Well, that shows they have some manners. Anywhere else they would laugh outright.

The Sorrow of It.

His Wife—If you had money enough to send me abroad for a year, I'd be happy.

Her Husband—And I would be still happier, my dear.

ALL READY!

Professional Advice.

Physician—You'll have to be careful this summer and not overexert yourself.

Patient—Then you think I ought to take a vacation, eh?

Physician—Certainly not. Didn't I just tell you not to overexert yourself?

Dead Wire ho Poems.

"Most people are not appreciated until after they are dead," sadly remarked the party with the unbarbered hair.

"That's right," rejoined the busy man behind the blue pencil. "They don't write any poetry then."

Down on His Luck.

"Shall I play one of your old favorites for you?" inquired Miss Quickrich, as she seated herself at the piano.

"No," replied Mr. Deadbroke, with a horse laugh. "Any old plug selling platter will do. All the old favorites I've had anything to do with lately have run me down."

Greek to Him.

The city niece had induced her rural uncle to accompany her to church.

"Isn't our choir grand?" she queried.

"Yes," he replied, "but have you any idea what they are singing about?"

Too Fast.

A daring young man named Magoon
Fell out of a bunted balloon,
He fell on his neck,
Exclaiming, "By Heck,
I reckon I landed too soon!"

AGENTS WANTED

Nearly all the readers of THE LEDGER will find their advertisement of interest to them. There will be found among them some excellent openings for making money by selling goods to friends, neighbors and others. Those seeking such an opportunity, either as a regular or temporary occupation, should write the advertisers whose offers follow.

WANT MONEY?

Sell our Hand-Painted Pebble Photo Holder and Perpetual Calendar combined. Nothing like it on the market. Sells at sight. Write for terms. Don't be fooled by the pretenders and waste time trying to get something for nothing. Send 25c. for sample and learn how to make money. Terms and particulars free, or sample and good quill on receipt of 25c. BUCKEYE NOVELTY CO., Bucklye Hill, Ohio.

LEARN to make Mirrors and make big money at home. Parts furnished. Man Masters, 100, Peru, Ind.

AGENTS, CREDIT, Perfumes, Flavors, etc. Big profits. Dresser Pad. Exclusive. Free. HERADEX AGENCY Co., Box 32, Sta'n L, New York.

AGENTS wanted to sell the Celebrated Thermite Transparent Handle Pocket Knives. Write for terms. Reference, C. C. Co. J. Keene, Ill.

AGENTS make big money selling Gro-Solvent. Instantly removes machine grease, paint, ink, etc., without injury to the finest fabric. Write for sample and terms. COLLIAT Co., 320 Broadway, New York.

SELL TOBACCO AND CIGARS. Local or traveling. Full time or side line. Steady work. Good pay. Address MONOPOLY TOBACCO WORKS, Box 8 18, DANVILLE, Va.

AGENTS PORTRAITS 85c., FRAMES 15c. Crayons, Pastels, Water Colors, Panels, Miniatures, Etc. 30 days credit. Samples & Catalog Free. General Portrait Co., 566-W Adams St., Chicago.

$18 to $30 WEEKLY Guaranteed Men & Women Sell Watches, Jewelry, or spare time. Weeks $30 Extra. Send for full particulars. Address at once UNION WATCH CO., Dept. 189, CHICAGO, Ill.

Fish Will Bite Like hungry wolves if you use Magic Fish Lures. Best that Bait ever invented. You catch a big string of fish every time you go fishing. Write today and get a box to help introduce it. Agents Wanted. T. F. Gregory, 3319 Oregon Ave., St. Louis, Mo.

WE WANT AGENTS

In every town to take orders for Clothes Line Reels and Corn-cob from $1.00 up, and Brooms from $1.50 up. Big commissions paid and only Broom Outfit in the selling case furnished free to those who can do business. You can make money working on the side. Write for Gen'l Agency Proposition. THE H. W. MILLS Dept. 50, 178 Adams St., Chicago.

AGENTS WANTED

200 Per Cent Profit. Sell our Big $1.00 bottle Sarsaparilla for 50 cts. Best Seller. Fleet Medicine. Complies With Pure Drug Law. Everyone buys. Write now for terms. F. R. GREENE, 21 Lake St., Chicago.

SALESMEN WANTED.

Men who possess selling ability can get the most for it by representing us for the sale of our popular policies of accident and health insurance. Experience not essential. Exclusive territory, and active co-operation given to hustlers. Excellent openings and liberal terms for agents, collectors and district managers. Address, at once, Dept. 78, Continental Casualty Co., Chicago, Ill.

MAGIC BILL BOOK!

An entertaining and mystifying trick that astonishes and mystifies all who see it. Sent postpaid on receipt of 10 cents; not a stamp taken. Send today. Agents wanted. W. C. WATKINS & CO., Box 1505, Pittsburg, Pa.

LOTS of MAIL

Would you like to get a lot of letters, circulars and packages? If so, read this advertisement very carefully. Every year the United States Government supplies names, wholesalers and publishers buy names and addresses for the purpose of sending samples, advertising matter, price-lists, etc. Good names and addresses are hard to get and are quite expensive. The publish on Agent's Directory are carefully arranged in alphabetical order, and all those Directory Lists to concerns we know are anxious for good names and advertising matter. The cost of arranging these names in suitable shape and taking care of them is considerable to say and it costs us silver for our trouble. Write your name very plainly on the printer will not make a mistake; be sure to give your street number and town also plainly written so as to avoid mistakes. Send your name and address as above stated saying you wish your name inserted in our Agent's Directory List and we will insert it in the next Directory which we are now preparing.

AGENT'S DIRECTORY LIST, 403-405, Dalton Court, CHICAGO.

When answering advertisements you will oblige the advertiser and the publishers by mentioning The Chicago Ledger.

TWO FACES UNDER ONE HAT.

By H. E. SCOTT.

Author of "The Pretty Typewriters," "The Girl from Nacoupin," etc.

[Copyright by the Author.]
Begun in No. 21, May 25. Subscriptions can begin with that issue or back copies can be obtained from news stands, or our agents, or by mail from office of publication.

CHAPTER XX.

"JUST WAIT."

"Congratulate me, Abner!" exclaimed Caleb, a moment later, when he had left Kate in the hall and entered the room where the farmer was seated. "Kate has promised to become my wife on the 15th of September."

"I foresaw it, Marsh," said Abner. "On the 15th, you say? Why, then Elwood's safe!"

"Without a doubt, neighbor, without a doubt!"

"Give me your hand, Marsh! This is the happiest hour I have seen for many a day! Kate! Kate!"

"Yes, father!" and she entered the room. "God bless you, my daughter! Caleb has just confided to me the fact that you are his promised wife. A man who, because of his love for you, could be as kind to your old friend as he has been for months past by, can but be to you a kind and indulgent husband. I am very happy over your engagement, my child."

"The engagement is conditional, father."

"Conditional, child? How so?"

"I shall become the wife of Mr. Marsh, father, on the day he has stated, unless his mortgages are paid before that day."

"Then you will become a bride, dear! It is virtually an engagement."

"Just what I tell her, Abner. I think she but added the conditions to keep me on the anxious seat. She is not averse to becoming my wife; but girls will be girls, I take it. I am quite satisfied, and I am a happy man. She will be the purest hearted Lady ever turned out, and until Arthur comes home and marries, our home shall be your home. When you become a bridegroom you will have two homes. You must leave Elwood for a while, Kate, but a brunette will prize more than I would a dozen Elwoods! Goodby! I must hasten home and gladden the heart of Sarah with the news that Caleb Marsh will not die an old bachelor."

A moment more and he was seated in his buggy was speeding homeward.

"Are you satisfied with the engagement, Kate?" asked the old man.

"Why talk of it, father?" was the reply. "I knew the time was near when I would be called on to decide. I think it would kill you to lose Elwood."

"Elwood? Lose Elwood?" exclaimed the farmer excitedly.

"Why, yes, surely. Should I refuse to wed Mr. Marsh on the 15th of September he would take Elwood from you."

"Then it is for my sake, daughter? All for my sake? But Arthur may come home before that date. If not——"

"If not, father, and the mortgages remain unpaid, I will become his wife. I—I may not be so very unhappy. At least, you shall not lose Elwood."

"God bless you, my child! I know Marsh will be very good to you, or even he and you sacrifice yourself—but Elwood! Elwood!"

"There, there, father, talk of it no more; the matter is settled. You are not to lose Elwood."

"Caleb Marsh has done much to win your hand, daughter. He has done much more; he something besides a cold and cruel man. It was for your sake he extended the mortgage. I never dreamed that there was for my charming daughter, could so influence him. I think you will be very happy. At least, you will be the wife of a wealthy man, and all your cares will be ended."

"Caleb Marsh, something has happened," said his sister, when he entered the house, after arriving home, "and I'll bet a cent you guess what it is."

"Yes, Sarah, I guess you can. The girl has consented. We are to be married the 15th of September."

"The girl's no fool, Caleb! She couldn't defer it another day. Ha, ha! You'd have foreclosed!" But she was only jesting.

"Cry? Not a bit of it, Sarah. Have I not been for months trying to get her consent willingly? I have got it, too; that is, with one proviso, that these the mortgages are paid before the date set for our marriage. Then the engagement is not to be considered binding. Oh, she must have a most anxious seat. But then, there is no danger of the mortgages being paid. The girl is mine and so is Elwood. And so is——"

"Hell?"

"Ah, well, and so is she your future sister-in-law, Sarah; that is all."

"Well, Caleb, you've worked hard enough to obtain the hand of a penniless girl; but as you wanted her, I am glad you have got her. Dennis Wright has been married a wife that would have brought you property. Elwood is in very bright, airy way—but then I can't say anything. I plead your case mighty hard the last time I was there."

"Never mind about the penniless girl, Sarah—I'm fool! I'll take care to give her surprise you one of these days, and I will. Just wait!"

"Caleb, I believe you love that girl!"

"I am rather inclined to think you are right, Sarah. I am, for a fact. She's young and handsome and sprightly. Why shouldn't I? But there is something else. Just wait!"

"In Heaven's name, what else is there?"

"You will have to curb your curiosity for a while, Sarah, but just bear in mind that Caleb Marsh's head has never been turned by love."

"Ha, ha!" laughed Sarah, "I will. Well, the girl is well enough, Caleb, and you'll be good to her, I know."

"Of course I will. I will have reason, too. Yes, and to her father. Oh, he swears by me now, and the girl says she wouldn't have believed once that she could ever have thought so well of me, but I have long worked hard, yes, and spent money. I deserve the girl, and all that comes with her, don't I?"

"Yes, Caleb, you do; but I don't see as anything is coming with her but an invalid father. You will have him on your hands till he dies."

"Ha, ha! Just wait!"

CHAPTER XXI.

CALEB LOOKING AHEAD.

All too fast to Kate Ellis the summer months seemed to go. She had abandoned all hope of the mortgages on Elwood being satisfied and by her becoming the wife of Caleb, and his diamond ring now encircled the third finger of her left hand.

"If I am to become his wife," she had thought, "I should not show repugnance at wearing his ring. In the three days passed by, a feeling of horror grew up in her breast, that at times caused her to almost quake with terror.

Marsh was all kindness and concern for both her and her father. Many improvements had been carried on at Elwood, and the old place now looked as a thrifty and neighboring farm.

The season had been favorable and the crops all that could be desired.

"Caleb, you see, Abner," Caleb had said "you will be on your feet again. You will not only have a cleared title, but you will have a handsome sum in bank, and all at the expense of threshing the crop out, and that, Abner, I assure you shall not cost you a cent, and I will give you a bill of sale for them and what stock I have placed on the farm. I am not a man to be married. Only having a son-in-law that is foreshadowed will prevent the old man's will-power."

"Caleb, you have been a son to me! You have saved my home again! Bless you, dear Kate ought to love you."

"Oh, she will, neighbor, she will! I am sure that she already does. I paid three hundred dollars for the engagement ring—a handsome one, indeed, that adorned the finger of a bride in Lundy County."

"I can't understand such a cold, hard man like you—well, you know what I mean—like you always were, could have become so kind and generous. What can have been the bend kinder or more considerate than you have been."

"Put it all down to love, Abner, all down to love! To my notion, there is nothing a man would not do for the woman he truly loves."

"Few have done as much, Caleb. Bo you and Sarah are going to take her to Chicago to purchase her outfit?"

"Yes. You see this is the 25th of August. Sarah will help her select her wedding outfit, and after that, mind you, no expense is to be spared in that; then I will take her to New York. I know it takes time to rig up a bride, and it won't do to defer the matter any longer than is needful. You see, we will take an early train and be back on the night express."

"I should think that you might find material good enough and expensive enough for your wedding dress in Chicago, I'm sure that matter. You never was given to style or show."

"True, neighbor; but don't you see, I am about to take a young and handsome wife, and I don't intend that she shall have cause to blush at the altar over either my appearance or want of means. You know, it ain't as though I couldn't afford it."

I understand that, Caleb, and it shows how fond you are of your wife-elect and of the future happiness of your wife."

At dinner that day Caleb Marsh followed out of this conversation, Caleb Marsh accompanied by his sister, Miss Marsh, a resident of Coulton, and Kate Ellis arrived in Chicago.

Miss Marsh had been engaged to prepare the trousseau, and it was thought best that she accompany them.

Kate had been more than anxious for some weeks to visit Chicago. "There," she had thought, "I may meet Arthur, and that seems like a feeble one." She had readily consented to Caleb's proposal.

Numerous dry goods houses were visited, purchases were made, the goods ordered sent by express to Coulton.

It was near two o'clock when the party arrived at a restaurant on Dearborn street and seated themselves for dinner.

"Now and then," Kate had thought Kate, "I must in some way. It is positively my duty as a woman to myself that I should take advantage of it; but I would like to have it possible to do so. And I must be satisfied that I am sure, for our marriage, Mr. Marsh!"

"A penny for your thoughts, Miss Kate," said Caleb suddenly. "You seem deeply engrossed. Have you forgotten somethings?"

"I cannot go about here alone," thought Kate. "I will try."

"I have often thought, Mr. Marsh," she said aloud, "I would like to see and talk to Mr. Horton. I was thinking but Caleb's in it, in any way?"

"Why, certainly, Miss Kate, certainly! I am glad you made your desire known. I have been just wishing to call on the next point to be visited was a millinery establishment. We will let sister and her proceed there from here. We will visit Mr. Horton's office in the Board of Trade building, and then after you have had your talk with Mr. Horton, I should be glad to join you."

Kate was much pleased at the readiness with which Caleb found a way to carry out her wishes. "I am very thankful to you," she said.

A half-hour later they entered the office door. The old sign was yet above it—Horton, Baily & Co.

A smooth-faced clerk stood just within the railing.

"We called to see Mr. Horton, the senior member of the firm," said Caleb.

"Then you will be disappointed, sir," was the reply. "Mr. Horton and his family have been in Europe for the past four months."

"Indeed!" said Caleb, with evident surprise. "Then we shall be unable to see him."

Kate felt her heart sink in her bosom, as she asked: "When will he be return?"

"Really, I am unable to state," replied the young man. "We have not been advised, but probably not before the first of November."

"November!" exclaimed Kate unconsciously.

"Is there anything I can do?"

"Nothing, nothing!" said Caleb quickly. "We wished to see Mr. Horton. We can only call again, after his return."

"Were—were you here in Mr. Baily's time?" asked Kate.

"No, miss, I have been with the firm but six months."

"Shall we go, Mr. Marsh?" said Kate, turning to him.

"I judge we may as well," was the reply. "I am very sorry you could not have seen him."

"You will never know how I regret it," thought Kate, as she pulled that now her hand alone could clear away the mortgages that hung over Elwood.

"I could do no more, my dear," observed Caleb, as they were passing from the building.

"I am very thankful to you, Mr. Marsh, very!"

At the millinery establishment they rejoined Miss Morton and Miss Marsh, and Caleb left the ladies for the purpose of making some purchases for himself.

"In this large city, somewhere," thought Kate, "I have an aged grandfather whom I have never seen. If I could find each for him—but no, father would never forgive me. Ah, here is a directory!"

When Miss Morton, Sarah and the milliner were talking, she perused its pages: "Phi Beta," she ran one finger down the columns of names commencing with "P." The name did not appear.

"An old man—he is probably dead," she thought. "And yet Mr. Marsh saw him last year. He is not seven. If I could find him in directory. He has died since then—died, and left his estate to Arthur. I wonder that would have enabled his granddaughter to have his hand where she would.

"Miss Kate!"

"Yes, Miss Marsh!"

"Come, we must finish trading by the time my brother returns. You don't seem half interested in your wedding outfit."

"Oh, a large city quite confuses me. And then I rely more on your judgment and that of Miss Morton than I do on my own."

At five o'clock, when Caleb rejoined them, their purchases were all completed, and they arrived at the depot in time for the six o'clock train.

"You will have the most elaborate outfit of any bride I have helped array, Miss Ellis," observed Miss Morton, as the cars were nearing them from Chicago. "Oh, you will be the envy of every girl in Lundy County."

"Oh, no!" laughed Caleb. "Just what I intended, and I flatter myself that when I stand beside her at the altar my old friends won't declare that I have ordered a wedding suit, the sight of which will astonish the natives of Lundy county, when they first see it on Caleb Marsh. Ha, ha!"

"Why, brother, what on earth is the matter?"

"Nothing, Sarah. Just wait!"

It was two o'clock when the train drew up to the Coulton depot, where Caleb's carriage was in waiting. He had hired a team, Miss Morton good night, he assisted his sister and Kate to enter it, entered himself and the vehicle whirled away.

Arrived at Elwood, Caleb conducted Kate to the fortunes door, opened it for her, and settled back in the carriage as the driver mounted to his seat.

"I am not to go to-day to over, Sarah," he said, "very glad. I was anxious to give Kate an opportunity of reflection before the 15th, and I did so; that is, I took her to his office."

"And she saw him? He refused to lift the mortgages?"

"Saw him? The man was in Europe!"

"And you knew it?"

"That they visited Chicago today, Sarah, would have stayed home had I not known it. I am no fool! I was looking for—I didn't want it the girl thinking at the last minute that Mr. Horton might lift those mortgages for Elwood! No! There is but one contingency that could arise to thwart me, and that never will. Arthur Ellis is dead!"

"Oh, he must be! I guess Kate thinks so."

"Yes, I think she has given him up, but not to the extent that she would be willing to be expecting his return."

"Oh, there is no danger of your losing your bride, Caleb. She ought to be the happiest girl in the county."

"Oh, you know how much money I am worth, Sarah?"

"Why, you were saying last week that between us we were worth all of two hundred thousand dollars."

"Surely, I am eight hundred thousand dollars in my own right!"

"Impossible, Caleb! This love business has turned your head."

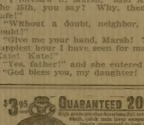
"Just you wait, Sarah!"

CHAPTER XXII.

AN UNEXPECTED MEETING.

One hundred miles northwest of Denver, in the Medicine Bow range, were located two young miners in the "fifth" of April, 1885, in a peculiar manner located a mining claim by which the owners, if not worked alone and without the aid of machinery, aside from picks, bars and the usual implements for surface mining, they easily secured a fortune.

One of these young men was the same John Merrill, who, on that September day, eight months before, on the bank of Cherry Creek and within the corporate limits of the city of Denver had read from the columns of the Coulton Record an article proclaiming a reward for the apprehension of



The Handy Doctor in Your Vest Pocket

IT'S a thin, round-cornered little Enamel Box—

When carried in your vest pocket it means Health-Insurance.

It contains Sick Candy Tablets of pleasant taste, almost as pleasant as Chocolate.

Each tablet is a working dose of Cascarets, which acts like Exercise on the Bowels and Liver.

It will not purge, sicken, nor upset the stomach.

Because it is not a "Bile-driver," like Salts, Sodium, Calomel, Jalap, Senna, nor Aperient Waters.

Neither is it like Castor Oil, Glycerine, or other Oily Laxatives that simply lubricate the intestines for wants of the food stopped up in them at that particular time.

* * *

The chief cause of Constipation and Indigestion is a weakness of the Muscles that contract the Intestines and Bowels.

Cascarets are the greatest tonic to the Bowel Muscles what a Massage and Cold Bath are to the Athletic Muscles.

They stimulate the Bowel Muscles to contract, expand, and squeeze the Digestive Juices out of food eaten.

They don't help the Bowels and Liver in such a way as to make them lean upon similar assistance for the future.

This is why, with Cascarets, the done may be lessened each succeeding time instead of increased, as it must be with all other Cathartics and Laxatives.

* * *

Cascarets act like exercise.

If carried in your vest pocket, (or carried in My Lady's Purse,) and eaten just when you suspect you need one, you will never know a sick day from the ordinary ills of life.

Because these ills begin in the Bowels, and pave the way for all other diseases.

"Vest Pocket" box 10 cents.

Be sure you get the genuine, made only by the Sterling Remedy Company, and never sold in bulk. Every tablet stamped "CCC."

one Mark Perry, the murderer of Philip Bailly, the Chicago packer.

It will be remembered that John Merrill tore the paper into shreds and casting the fragments on the surface of the stream walked rapidly away.

Ten days later, with a miner's outfit, he was prospecting in the Clear Creek gold fields.

"Here," he thought, "I shall meet no living soul that ever gazed on the features of Mark Perry. Here I can safely strive for the accumulation of a fortune, and await the time, if it ever comes, when the man for whose crime I am an exile shall be apprehended."

How little does man know what the fates have in store for him, or at what moment when he fancies himself quite new surroundings and among strangers, a further move may appear before him, or a well known voice sound in his ear.

Here was John Merrill, hundreds of miles from the scene of the tragedy of the 14th of September, buried in the mining, and little dreaming that ere ten short days had passed a miner would be sounding in his ears that would startle him—his own! Yet, so it was.

He had staked out a claim on the 10th of the month; but after five days' toil without even the color of gold, and wearied to read weird his efforts, he concluded that his session of a site had not been fortunate, and on the morning of the 16th day he loaded his pack mule and through the wilderness of the hills began a search for a better location, and in more promising location.

At night he built his campfire in a sheltered nook, staked out his mule, and with his trusty rifle beside him was soon in the land of nod, which was to bring with it a startling surprise.

It was the morning of the 17th, and early he was astir. Mule and pack saddle were all there, those miles behind, and was walking along, picking his way, with his trusty rifle on his shoulder, when he heard the sound of horse's footsteps, when suddenly, rounding a boulder, he came face to face with a young man, who, clad in miner's togery, with the sleeves of his woolen shirt rolled above his elbows, jumped off spring on the ground beside him, was lustily swinging a pick.

John Merrill saw at a glance that this young stranger was a tenderfoot in the development of a claim. "Changed his location, as I am doing," he thought. "I doubtless will see the last night for the first time."

"Good morning, friend!" he exclaimed, he laid his hand on the bridle rein of his mule and halted him. "You are striking pretty blows there."

"Good morning," returned the young man as he threw a fold of the pick and glanced at the newcomer. "Yes, I find hard blows necessary, and it is a question if they will tell. This is the third claim I have staked out in the past sixty days, with never a sign of gold. I like this section for surface mining though some have good luck. It is a beautiful country, and I—I—by—yes, yes; thank God, it is Mark Perry! Do you not know me, Mark?"

The man had rushed forward and seized him by the hand.

"Why, Arthur, Mark. What alls you, boy —you are as pale as death? Are you not sick? Here, sit down. I am sorry dog, but I love the dear ones at home as well as ever, and it is for their sake that I am striving to make a fortune. Yes, and I love my old schoolmate. But tell me, Mark, why do you come so suddenly upon me? Is my father dead? Do you bring me news from home? Have you seen them?" Slowly, Mark, surely—"

"Hush! Hush, Arthur! Are there others here?"

"Why, no, Mark, no; but if there were—who, then?"

"My name is John Merrill, Arthur, John Merrill! Do you hear? Mark Perry is a fugitive—but not justice. Do not pronounce that name again—the trees or rocks might overhear it, and the wind might bear it to the ears of those who, for the reward, would take Mark Perry back to the underwood death on the gallows. Oh, Arthur, Arthur!"

John Merrill's arms encircled him, and his form shook with emotion.

"Arthur, Arthur, did I should encounter here the brother of my lost darling! You will not—cannot betray me, Arthur.

"Betray you, Mark, dear Mark, I fear you are insane! If not, my life on your integrity! Tell me, tell me! The brother of your lost darling—I do not understand! I am dying with suspense! Have you not trust for Mark, your old schoolmate? Come sit here beside me—my campfire still smoulders, and tell me, tell me, Mark, tell me. Mark tell me! May I unpack your mule? Have you any further news? You, yes, here in the mines! But father—Kate? Can you tell me aught of them?"

"Come down, Arthur, for your faith in me; but it may be shaken. I will tell you all.

"There, the mule is unpacked. I will tie him here, and afterwards we can stake him out for the night. Oh, Arthur!"

"John Merrill, Arthur! You know not what you say. Call me not by that name, sign me to—the gallows!"

"Oh, no, no! You are laboring under some terrible mistake, I know I."

"By this time the two young men, who had been lovers from childhood, sat by the fire.

"First, tell me, tell me John Merrill. "I last saw you when you promised bride, sweet Kate, on the 9th of September. I shall never, never, for him, and Benny Kate's face beaming with happiness.

"Thank God for that, my friend!" exclaimed Arthur. "I have often hoped, Mark, he continued, "that you and I might one day wed."

"God bless you, Arthur; but I pray you, do not address me by that name. Henceforth I am John Merrill. You will soon see that with me a change of names was imperative. Now listen."

Here John Merrill commenced a recital of all the events that had transpired in the life of Mark Perry from the time he left Elwood, five years before, to the time of their unexpected meeting not an hour previous, concluding with a description of the scene at Sandy Run when he was confronted by Arthur and Kate, and where he denounced as the murderer of Philip Bailly.

"You know all, Arthur," he concluded. "Why I am a fugitive, and why I am in the integrity of your old friend—"

"Do you believe him worthy of your sister, or does the overwhelming evidence of

"Hush, Arthur!" cried Arthur, grasping his hand as he brushed aside the tears that had gathered in his eyes. "I have received your every word! My life on the integrity of Mark Perry! He is worthy of my sister's love! Poor, dear Mark!"

He cast his arms about the form of his companion, and John Merrill's head found a resting-place on his bosom.

"God bless you, my friend! I have at last found one who believes in my innocence!"

"Oh, we are all sure of it—John Merrill! Kate, surely, has never wavered, and my father will not lose faith in you. Mark! Mark, you have been sorely persecuted you to use them, would not have done so had you not been innocent. I have told them Doctor Dean and Horton—

"Do you not see, Arthur? Mark Perry's flight is in itself what was equal to an admission of his guilt. It was a fatal mistake. Had I remained I might, at best, but he exiled Mark Perry forever and rendered it impossible for him to claim his name or living to justice the guilty wretch for whom he stands."

"I never would have believed that cold-blooded Marsh would have cared whether you lived or died. He was the means of convict you to have removed you from his path, and thus secure the hand of Kate and my father's misfortunes to coerce Kate into becoming his wife. And yet you tell me that he has been appointed to the office of surprised at that, if he could have gained the position by unfair means."

"Marsh professed great friendship for your father, Arthur, and was kind to me and my friend, and that if I did not flee I would surely be hung. He pictured to me the grief that it would cause the dear ones at Y, who you will remember, obtained the ten thousand dollars from Mark Perry in his possession, as well as his watch, on the inner case of which his name was engraved would enable me to apprehended."

"Again," he said, 'he may be convicted for murder—even on the public road, and he may confess to Bailly's murder. There is no evidence that I am guilty of a dead one there is none.'"

"He displayed good judgment there."

"Then he added, 'I don't Kate would yet become my wife. 'Of course,' he observed, 'I realize that it is a question if he can handsome young girl to mate with. I realize that I have entered the mortgage—and give them a chance.'"

"I stated that Mr. Horton, I thought, would be willing to wait a little longer before to talk with him. He stated that he ran a big business, and that he could not afford to he did. 'Oh, Marsh showed another side to his character.'"

"Yes, he showed a desire to save your life, believing, as he did, that the evidence would convict you. But he knew that the mortgages was surely criminal. Perhaps we should have exposed him, but Kate is not his wife, but the methods he resorted to were not unlike the man. I am more sure, Arthur, that the evidence would acquit and stand it. I supposed there was but one way for me to establish my innocence, and that was to return that there are two."

"I am thankful that he sent you that paper, Mark, for now we can find out if it is genuine. And for that he deserves our thanks. He may have been right, do not wish that you listened to his. Why, the fact that you have received Dobbins alone would have convicted you—unfortunately for you, but half your sentence. Mark, I am glad to find in me who will stick to you to the end. And now let me return to your narrative. Pardon me, of course, I'll there with a view of accumulating a fortune with which to clear my father's name. The mortgages that hung over it. I had heard so much of the large fortunes made in the mines of Clear Creek Board of Trade, that I induced my father to confide to me his savings, all he had, to my hands.

I ventured this money on one of those certain claims, and—well, the workers and discover, with the result that I was left nearly penniless. I would come as bravely as I could, and I was desperate. I could think of but one resort left, and that I would go to Clear Creek, try my luck there, and here I have been ever since—most the time disheartened to write home such time as I had good news to write.

"Only a few days ago I became more frantic at not hearing from you," said John Merrill, "though I have yet look for one letter, my father almost daily speaks of the improvements to be inaugurated at Sandy Run when you return. I expect a you to come home a wealthy man!"

"Bless his heart, a wealthy man, when I do return, but my fortune will have to change. I have never yet struck a claim even that paid wages, and I am now in debt on them some five day and chisel all I can out of them. I am now back four two years my father will not be pressed for that money—in fact, I promised him I would come. He can surely rent out the land for money enough to defray their expenses.

"I sent Kate three hundred dollars from the jail, by Marsh," said John Merrill.

"You could think of them at such a time! Oh, Mar- John Merrill!

"You know I told you I had six hundred dollars which I had expected to pay the interest. I wished Marsh to take five hundred, but he would take no more, though he promised that they should not suffer."

"I have a higher regard for Marsh than ever before; but I am glad he would take no more."

"He thought I would need it in making my escape."

"Well, I have about three hundred dollars' worth of nuggets and dust. I thought of trying to send that, but now I will not. We are together, and we will stay together. We will stake off another claim joining this one, and perhaps fortune may smile on us. If not, we can but try elsewhere. Besides, we are bound to strike a rich location, and when the time comes I will go back a rich man and spend a fortune but that I will get to the bottom of that mystery, clear your name and have you triumphantly come back and claim your bride."

"Bless you, Arthur! New hope springs up in my heart, but let me beseech you to write just a few informing them that you are well, and bidding them to hope. You know I dare not, nor must you mention me. Do not even mention the name of Mark Perry."

"I think we had best wait until we have met with some success. You say my father has left Elwood? Well, we him a joyful surprise before another year."

"The dear ones are well and safe—we are in the same condition. And then, my letter might be the means of bringing detectives upon our trail. It might be thought you had joined me. I presume mail to my father will be sent to you. We will take no chances now."

"You may be right, Arthur. And yet—I am glad to hear from you. Elwood is safe, and father will keep up heart."

"Oh, it would kill him to lose Elwood! Now his heart I bound up in that place. Mark, you will write? You see his father prompted it of the Government, and his appointment is in honor bound to transmit the place to me, though I must say I have no desire to accept it for the old home. Why, my boy, when we go East we will have the means to purchase a dozen Elwoods. Excuse it is two o'clock! I will get dinner and then we will turn out a few hours instead of this single one."

"Arthur I mourn for your misfortunes. I rejoice that I have a partner, and that partner is my old friend and schoolmate."

"Yes, Mark, I think I would have believed," said John Merrill, as the two men shook hands, "my first foe, "and I love you, Arthur."

"As well as you do Kate?" asked Arthur with a laugh.

"Oh, well, now—"

"Yes, I see. Well, my boy, you with young and can wait. All clouds be dispelled, and the happiest day wedding within two years. Here is the water bucket, partner, and there is the path to the spring. Hurry!"

John Merrill seized the bucket and dashed

"A partner, and one according to my own notion, all the same," said Arthur, as he watched his retreating figure. "And he loves me—almost as well as he does my Over there he never was a man to mean hair on Mark Perry's head, and he is not the kind to misread understand what could have come over Caleb Marsh. Well, I'll see him if Arthur used to say, 'It will all come out in the wash!'"

CHAPTER XXIII.

DEAD MAN'S GULCH.

Our two mining partners, thus happily united together, [illegible] to find a fortune in the Clear Creek gold fields. The [illegible] upon their valuables; their location was [illegible] real times, and with a like result, long and weary days and they accomplish to their store.

The night of the 10th of April, while sitting by their campfire, Arthur said:

"Listen, John Merrill, old boy, I know of a claim that will feel to meet with no success here. What to a trip to Dead Man's Gulch?"

"It's [illegible] travel to reach it [illegible] is a better showing for [illegible] surface mining."

"I am agreeable" was the reply.

"Then morning we will be camp and start.

The afternoon of the 19th of April, the third day since they had entered the range, they rather the foothills of the [illegible] were [illegible] mountains that loomed up on either side.

Dead Man's Gulch was a narrow [illegible] one upon another gulch, running nearly north and south, that converged into this one.

"They are not a day deserted," exclaimed: "this gulch does not extend from [illegible] to the other, but the black [illegible] of the mountain beyond. Let's explore this [illegible] to-morrow."

They had advanced into it perhaps a half-mile, and had just rounded a boulder, when they came upon a portion of sapphire from the lips of John Merrill.

"What is it, Mark?"

"There! Look there! was the reply. "A human skeleton!"

Arthur turned his eyes in the direction indicated. Sure enough, there, not ten feet from them, lay the grinning skull detached from the frame of which only the bones were left.

"Some luckless prospector who met his fate while seeking to better his condition," said Arthur. "Poor fellow! See, there is his rusty pick and spade. There by the rock he has been buried. He must have been murdered though, perhaps he died a natural death. There is no evidence that he had been digging for gold. Let us camp here, and place his bones beneath this rocky mound. [illegible] to camp," said his companion [illegible] plenty of water."

"The mules were soon unpacked and [illegible] a fire built, and the ground inspected there is nothing to identify him [illegible] Arthur. "No rifle, no smoking utensils, must have been murdered and their [illegible] said Merrill.

"And the companion took the mule of the [illegible] he died [illegible] and the body of his friend exhumed [illegible] We have [illegible] his bones. Let us [illegible]

Merrill had [illegible] stripped off his and selected his pick. About five [illegible] selected bone

[illegible] cured a bucket and step [illegible] stream that was babbling along the bottom of the gulch, and when he returned with it filled he found that his friend made some [illegible] [illegible] and [illegible]

[illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] bucket on the [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] his right hand, which had rested on the mixture of [illegible] [illegible] brought up, and the first and second fingers a peculiar [illegible] [illegible] and in the [illegible] [illegible] If there is [illegible] all you turn [illegible] hands [illegible] that is no or [illegible] The [illegible] you to washed away [illegible] seven [illegible] moment a glad [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] Found it here in dead [illegible] [illegible] It [illegible] nugget of gold, and my [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]

1 CENT IS ALL IT COSTS

to write us a postal and get our big free catalog and special offer on the finest guaranteed wheels, sent prepaid on approval, no money in advance, no C.O.D. Freight, allow 10 Days Free Trial on your new bicycle. Many exclusive features not found on other wheels. Write us today for our free catalog and special offer.

DO NOT BUY a bicycle or a pair of tires from anyone at any price until you learn what we have to offer you. Our prices will astonish and our terms will please you. Freight, allow 10 Days Free Trial on your new bicycle. Many exclusive features not found on other wheels. Write us today for our free catalog and special offer.

WE WILL CONVINCE you that we sell a better bicycle for less money than any other house. Buy direct from the factory. A cent to us may mean dollars to you. Write today.

Boys Wanted to ride and exhibit sample bicycle. Dealers Wanted in each locality to ride and exhibit sample bicycle. Agents Wanted to take orders from our local customers. Write today.

Coaster-Brakes, Lamps, Sundries and all sundries at half usual prices. Do Not Wait, write us a postal and learn everything. Write today.

MEAD CYCLE CO., Dept. T 53 Chicago, Ill.

OPIUM and Liquor Habit cured in 10 to 20 days. No pay till cured. Write for FREE BOOK. Dr. J. E. Stephens Co., Dept. B, E. Lebanon, Ohio.

MAGIC NEEDLES Wonderful invention, sewing machine needles, fit any machine, sent by mail, postpaid, FREE to any reader. Send 10c for 3 months' subscription to FARM AND FIRESIDE, 10 cents a year. Springfield, Ohio.

DETECTIVES Earn big money. Travel. Experience unnecessary. Write, stating age. Particulars free. Standard Detective System, 1564 Broadway, New York.

YOUR FORTUNE Told FREE

by the world's greatest Astrologer. Send me your name and address, the date of your birth, and 2c stamp for postage, and I will send you a Horoscope of your life from birth to death with a special forecast for MAY. I have made 7 others happy and believe I can help you.

PROF. LEE, Dept. 9, NATICK, MASS.

PLUMP-U-LEAN!

A SCIENTIFIC TREATMENT to DEVELOP THE FORM into graceful curves. BUST, HIPS LIMBS, and entire FIGURE. The treatment is guaranteed perfectly harmless. No time to exercise or physical development scheme connected with it. It has been successfully used for the past 10 years. For particulars address

PLUMP-U-LEAN CO., Lock Box 454, Chicago, Ill.

WETO GRAPH

The Great Secret Writing System

FOR LOVERS AND OTHERS

Every letter and word you write secretly conveyed here a Weto Graph. It is a system of secret sign writing for correspondence, etc. If you have a Weto Graph you can preserve recipes, secret memorandum, addresses, or information you do not want others to read, etc. You can write to your friends on postcard so no one can find out what you have written. Price 10c. Send for one to-day. You cannot do without it. Sent sealed and secret by the Weto Graph by mail, with full instructions. Address

PENN PUBLISHING CO., FARNASSUS, PA.

Free Sample COPY of COMMERCIAL POULTRY, a journal devoted to the culture of poultry. Issued monthly. Every number contains valuable information for poultrymen. Its articles are prepared by men who have made a success of raising poultry. They tell the reader, in these articles, how to produce the best results with the smallest expenditure. Don't take our word for this. Send for a sample copy and see for yourself. Write to COMMERCIAL POULTRY CO.

Dept. 23, Marseilles, Ill.

When answering advertisements you will oyor the advertiser and the publishers by mentioning The Chicago Ledger.

THE BALLOON BOYS;

Or The Wizards of the Air.

By COL. LAWRENCE LESLIE.

(Copyright by the Author.)

Begun in No 23, June 8. Subscriptions can begin with that issue, or back copies can be obtained from news stands, or our agents, or by mail from office of publication.

CHAPTER X.

WHERE WINTER REIGNS.

As soon as they found themselves free from the mighty currents, and soaring upward like a bird, both voyagers seemed to remember that even in those clear regions they were far from being safe.

Instinctively they cast their eyes upward, and in a southerly direction.

They were not long in discovering the object they sought.

It astonished them to see what a distance had been placed between their rival and themselves during the time they were among the clouds.

Really, their progress must have been at a rate faster than any railroad train ever built.

No doubt when they dropped into the region of cold below, their engines cooled them as dead to the world.

There was not more than one chance in a dozen of their ever getting out of the situation alive.

No doubt upon discovering the sky wanderer emerging from the waste of clouds, the professor and his companion were attacked.

They would soon be forced to believe these young aeronauts possessed charmed lives.

Still, the superior sailing qualities of the new balloon would in due time enable them to overtake the pursued craft.

Once above it again, the same tactics could be put into operation to force them into a repetition of their dangerous fall among the clouds.

Bob understood this.

It accounted for his making no movement to stay the upward flight of the gas monster as it mounted higher and higher.

Now they were on a level with the other balloon. Pete looked at his companion.

Bob appeared quite unconcerned, and gave no sign of a halt.

How high could they go and live?

Down on the earth the air was hot and sultry as became an August day.

They were shivering with the cold, and little Barbara was only too glad to wrap the blanket about her.

It was a wonderful sensation this soaring in space, with the earth blotted out by the clouds below, and can only be appreciated by those daring souls who have ventured forth in the frail vehicles of sky transportation.

The day will come, is almost here in fact, when the people of this country will think nothing of going from New York to Chicago by daylight, and through the air.

Greater wonders than that have already been done and more marvelous things are coming at the hands of Santos Dumont and his fellow.

Today the submarine vessel of Jules Verne's fertile imagination is an assured reality.

Nothing is impossible with the genius of science. Hence, let us wait, and hold our breath.

When the young voyagers had mounted to a position considerably above the level of the other balloon, Bob checked their ascent.

Then they drifted on.

As was expected, the pursuers gained.

In an hour they had decreased the distance to one-half.

Bob knew of no way in which he could change the condition of affairs.

When, however, he saw his enemies start at their old trick and toss out ballast, he was determined that the same game could not be played on him a second time.

As a consequence they began to once more mount upward.

Pete obeyed orders without a word, but shivered with the cold.

The cold began to grow intense.

It was easy to understand why snow remains on the tops of certain mountains all through the year.

There is a time when at this distance above the earth from the poles to the equator, that the mercury rises above freezing.

When the two men saw what they were doing there was no doubting much astonishment on their part.

The atmosphere was losing much of its vitality, and they had to breathe like the panting deer after being chased by Adirondack hounds.

It was folly trying to outdo a couple of daring young aeronauts of this kind, and perhaps did not even know the danger involved.

Besides, there was Pete amusing himself by popping away with his rifle.

True, the distance was so great, and the circumstances under which he fired so peculiar, that there was small chance of his striking anything, but at least his action proved the boys to be fully aroused.

They had stood enough of this thing and were ready to strike back.

No doubt a consultation of council of war was hurriedly held.

The upward movement ceased.

In spite of all the cold they could pile on, the cold was so intense, and their chances of arousing their stagnant blood so poor, that they must not only suffer dreadfully, but freeze to death unless the opportunity was embraced to drop to a lower position.

While they considered, the balloon of the professor was advancing toward the other.

Perhaps the sight of a piece of lead which Pete sent toward them aroused the two plotters to a sense of their danger.

Something must be done.

Pete had a gun with a longer range than their own, and to reply was a waste time and take new chances.

They began to experience some of the trepidation that had been up to this time monopolized by the more youthful cruisers of the upper air.

To ascend was out of the question, and unless they did so their bones were useless.

Only one other thing remained.

This was to go down.

The storm had broken below, and through the scattering legions of clouds they could catch glimpses of land and water, forming a scene as near like a master painting as words could describe.

When Pete cried out that the other balloon was falling, his companion smiled grimly, and pulled the valve string to allow a certain amount of gas to escape.

Thus they fell in company.

The region of the clouds was reached.

How much more comfortable—after all the earth was a pretty good place, for its children.

Pete pulled off his extra coat, and coaxed Barbara into viewing the lovely landscape.

They still continued to descend, so that while they view became more circumscribed, the features of the landscape stood out more clearly.

Finding that all the while the others had kept gaining Pete got out his gun again.

"Give 'em a shot across their bows as they do at sea, as a warning to come to," said Bob.

The other did so.

It was understood, for while the downward motion of the pursuing craft ceased, a strange drag appeared [illegible] like a parachute [illegible]

[illegible] Hardly the [illegible] quit firing on condition that they keep their [illegible]

[illegible] Their gun won't [illegible] this far, you see. Well, what shall I do [illegible]

"Nothing.

"I'm sure I can punch a hole in their silk.

"Don't do it. Our case is no longer desperate. The day is near an end—we are not victims of a storm, nor do we fear their five messengers.

"What do you mean to do?"

"Watch for a good opportunity and stretch our legs upon the surface of old Mother Earth again."

CHAPTER XI.

ANCHORED IN MICHIGAN.

It was to be wished, for although not twelve hours had elapsed since they first bound upward into space, so much had happened since then, and such was the distance they had traveled that it seemed ages ago that they stood upon solid ground.

Pete welcomed the proposal with a grin, and even petite Barbara seemed to become more like herself when she learned that the first stage of their balloon voyage was over or at least drawn near an end.

The fact that Signor Carasina was with the other air vessel gave her uneasiness.

She sensed the fact that an enemy was near her for the purpose of completing his work.

If last it had been an accident, Pete's line had grown to hate the very sight of the child, although her face beneath it is kind and sweet, and a bearing on his part.

The sun was drawing near the horizon, and it was a sure sign that it was setting over the northern world.

If they expected to find a good place for landing, now was the time to do it.

Bob let a little more gas escape, and they sank more rapidly.

"Look! there are some people near those cabins. Why, they look like what I can see them grow as we draw nearer," cried Barbara, clinging her hands at the joyous prospect of soon reaching a firm footing.

"See them wave their arms. It's a great day for Squawboro when a balloon goes over," remarked Pete, with equal enthusiasm.

Bob was watching!

He saw that the rivals had also dropped to about the same level, as though they did not mean to be left in case of a landing.

"They're after us, Pete."

"In good working order. Shall I drop 'em now?"

"Oh! no. I didn't mean that. Is it fully loaded, the magazine part?"

"Yes, about half, I reckon."

"Then I'd fill it up.

"See here, you don't expect these Wolverines will attack us?" They know better than to take us for a big roe, the kind that carried off Sinbad the Sailor."

At this Bob laughed outright.

"They're all right, but who these parties I mean to watch. See how they follow us."

"Could it would be a good idea to fire another shot across their bows and make them go down, for those cabins must belong to them, and be our own masters."

"Try it and see, but be careful not to hit them."

Pete let go, and the smoke, together with the report, made Bob speak of his rifled shot, told the men in the rear that they had again crossed the danger line.

They did not see a fair opportunity to alight just at this time, and or the spur of the moment the matter accepted it.

Being an adept at the business, of course the old aeronaut was not to be outdone, and a credit as the last our friends saw of them, the balloon was bobbing along with the following breeze, and the men about their yokels hanging onto the anchor rope that had been thrown out for this very purpose.

It was time they began to look for some such place of deposit themselves, since night was coming on, and darkness began to blot out the features of the landscape below. their difficulties in case they determined to alight, must be easily multiplied.

They were in the v-ry midst of a town.

Occasional cabins could be seen as they drifted along, in which lights were beginning to appear.

This region is given up almost wholly to lumbering, and the advent of two balloons in one day was enough to arouse the keenest interest among the honest people, many of whom had never seen such a sight before. Even the parachute professor had not invaded this country to this low.

As they skirted one end of the village, Bob saw a chance to make a landing.

It looked like an open campus or commons. The opportunity was too good to lose.

He had stood in readiness with the grappling iron, and at a word prepared to fall rapidly.

"Now!"

Down went the grappling iron.

It had four prongs, and could hardly drag along the ground any distance without seizing upon something that would stay their progress, in the shape of a log or a rail fence.

Several men had come plunging through the trees like mad.

Chasing a ball [illegible] was a new experience and one not down on their programme.

To their astonishment, presently they were swinging to the ir laughing and scrambling about like a pack of boys at school

More gas escaped—Bob was quite reckless of it now, and although Pete said nothing he wondered how under the sun they were going on the back track, since the balloon could never be filled again in this [illegible]

I trust it, Bob was complete, a [illegible] quite willing to let the future take care of itself.

SAY, BOY!

DO YOU WANT A JOB?

WE HAVE ONE FOR YOU.

We Want Agents Everywhere to Sell

THE SATURDAY BLADE

THE CHICAGO LEDGER

We Pay the Largest Commission

for selling papers. You can make more money in less time selling our papers than any other way. They sell at sight.

You pay nothing until your papers are sold. We send Agent's Outfit free. You sell the papers during spare hours on Saturday, and you do not have to pay for unsold papers.

26,000 Agents are selling the Blade and Ledger now, but we want more. We want at least one boy in every town and city. No town is too small—no city is too large for an agency.

Send your Application in Today, and we will get you started at once. Don't wait until some other boy gets the job. Write at once. A postal will do.

Address W. D. BOYCE CO., Agent's Dept., CHICAGO, ILL.

It is beautiful to have such faith in another, and saves a heap of worrying.

This last act of Bob's brought the balloon to a stop—indeed, they came near being spilled out upon the ground, and there was much laughing as they scrambled to maintain their equilibrium.

The balloon was secured to some posts that fortunately happened to be near, and some rocks placed in the basket to take the place of their weight, making the strain on the ropes less.

Bob would not abandon his craft at once. He explained that there was danger of malicious persons attempting to do it an injury.

As much of his story as he chose to tell aroused the indignation of the honest lumbermen, and when he expressed his desire to hire several of them to guard the Sky Traveler during the night, they were all ready to speak at once.

When three had been selected, they went back for their guns, and after seeing them on duty the boys felt they could rest secure.

One thing bothered Bob.

Perhaps the Italian might claim Petite Barbara.

He declared to be her father.

The law would be on his side.

So Bob made inquiries, and was delighted to learn that the marshal of the place, the only official who could do anything was at Lansing with a prisoner.

Signor Carusini would call in vain upon the strong arm of the law to restore his child.

Straight to the house of a leading man the young aeronauts and their girlish charge went, followed by an enthusiastic crowd.

It was a great day, for Pine Knot, as the timber town was eloquently named.

They told a great cock-and-bull story.

Here supper was prepared, and they were treated as guests of honor.

The daughter of the house was a pretty girl who interested Bob from the start, because she seemed to unite so many of the good qualities that go to make up an excellent woman in due course of time.

Pete was not wholly in the counsels of his companion, and allowed the latter to do most of the talking.

Indeed, he generally referred all seekers after information to Bob.

He knew the latter had waited for a certain favoring breeze because it was his desire to descend to earth rather than be wafted to the east or south.

That there was something back of this he knew full well, and patiently waited for his comrade to explain.

Bob let the boy's head turned by the attention he received, being far too sensible for that.

His thoughts were with the balloon, since it was the very means to use in the carrying out of his plans.

Pete heard the various questions concerning the mineral wealth, and of the region around Macinac. That is was not idle curiosity impelling this course on Bob's part he knew full well, and he wondered all sorts of vague things, even to speculating whether his companion hoped to discover a gold mine up in the copper region.

Later on they walked over to the campus. Bob was worried.

He knew the unscrupulous nature of the Italian, and perhaps imagined that the other could give a shrewd guess concerning the nature of his mission to this land of pines.

They found the guards on duty, patrolling the open space with guns on their shoulders, although regularly enlisted soldiers.

They had news to relate.

Before the boys had been gone half an hour two men appeared, strangers to them, but who answered the description given of the aeronaut and his companion.

They told a great cock-and-bull story, accusing the lads of all manner of evil things, and offering the guards double pay to let them destroy the balloon.

This attempt to buy their allegiance aroused the indignation of the lumbermen, who had been greatly taken with the frank, ingenious faces of the boys, and felt an instinctive dislike for the men, particularly the velvet voiced Italian. They told him plainly that they were not to be bought—so that they had promised their assistance to Balloon Bob and his chum, and were ready to prove the fervor of their allegiance by ducking the men in the creek near by if they attempted any mean trick.

Thus matters stood at the time our boys returned.

The men had hauled off, baffled but not defeated.

CHAPTER XII.

THE VOYAGE RESUMED.

Naturally Bob was well pleased with such a show of firm his faithful allies, nor did he hesitate to warmly thank them.

They had contempt for men who would adopt such cowardly tactics as those brought into play by the two plotters.

Living a simple life, they possessed a keen love for fair play, and it would go hard with the signor and his companion in case they tempted any of their miserable work around here.

Bob busied himself about the basket of the balloon, while Pete watched curiously.

The great silk bag still stood up, but enough of the precious gas had escaped to cause it to top over considerably.

It was evidently not buoyant enough to carry the three of them above the tree tops.

How then did Bob propose to accomplish this thing in a region where gas was unknown?

That was a puzzler to Pete.

He saw his companion open a small box, holding the lantern carefully.

Then they revealed many small globes of some material.

Bob took one in his hand.

"This is divided into two sections, each of which contains a separate acid. If I break the globe, the acids unite and form a very powerful gas, even more buoyant than that taken in ordinary coal. Each little bomb can be counted on for so many cubic feet of gas. So you see, having made all preparations, I can easily fill out the balloon.

So saying he removed the lantern to a distance, but one of the globes to the arrangement under the neck of the balloon, crushed it, and immediately occupied its place with another.

When these had been sacrificed the balloon seemed to have recovered all its old time vigor and was tugging away at its anchorage with the impetuosity of a war horse scenting battle smoke.

This piece of business revived all of Pete's great faith in his friend.

He was ready in his enthusiasm to back Bob against the world.

They no longer felt like amateurs, after the long and exciting cruise so lately finished, which doubtless had few superiors in ballooning annals.

Bob was not yet done.

As he and Pete sat there on the edge of the basket he said:

"I think the time has come when you should know the true reason of this trip, old fellow. You believe it is only a spirit of adventure that has come here. True, I longed to go far up above the clouds and experience that joys that come to the aeronaut as he sails through azure fields with the earth at his feet.

"There was another motive. I have hoped to unveil the secret that has always been upon my lifes—and now who I am."

Pete nodded his head in a knowing way—after all it was better than a gold mine. He felt the deepest interest in the success of his friend's mission, for although he had never found occasion to feel any particular pride over his father and mother, from whose stern fostering care he had decamped when but a small chap, still he could appreciate the delight that must accompany an utter lack of knowledge with respect to one's identity.

"I learned enough some time ago to make me wild to visit a certain section up in the peninsula of Michigan, a place where this same Signor Carvasini visits occasionally, and where I believe I shall find some one to claim me.

"What has that dago to do with your past?"

"More than even I suspected until lately. When my suspicions were aroused I began to lay little traps and experiment. I was successful in finding out many things. They made me long to know more, step by step I have come on. Pete, do you know why I jumped so eagerly at your proposal that we rescue Petite Barbara from his hands?"

"I—that is, you had a sympathetic feeling for one whose condition resembled your own."

"More than that—go deeper."

"Eh? what can you mean?"

"The same man hates us both, and is mixed up in our past.

"Yes."

"Even you remarked that we looked alike."

"Jerusalem! can it be possible?"

"I like to look at it in that way—to believe I have at least found some one in whose veins runs the same blood as in my own."

"A sister—your sister?"

"Heaven grant it may be so; but we shall know all in good time, and if my mission prospers it will not be many days before this grand secret is exposed."

"Well, Bob, I wish you every success. If it turns out as you say, it'll be just jolly. You've got the balloon ready—when do we skip out?"

Bob waited before answering.

"The wind has a great deal to do with that. It seems to be working almost from the south now. A point or so nearer the east will fetch us."

"Unless they put a stop to it!"

Bob shrugged his shoulders.

"Well try and prevent that."

"How can it be done? A gun will bring us down in a hurry."

"When we go back to our friends I'm going to get their assistance. I rather think they will see to it that no gun is not fired. Up in this region they do things in a peculiar way, and when our friend the professor and his Italian passenger want to grace some pine limb in this region they had better toe the mark and walk straight."

"Will they follow us?"

"I don't doubt that, when they are given the chance."

"But—their balloon is hardly in condition."

"Ah! I learned that little dodge of the gas bulls from the professor, so you see he is up to all the latest discoveries in that line. Oh! yes, they will come along when our friends the loggers give them permission."

"Let us return to barbara."

When they had communicated with some of the men, various plans were suggested.

On the whole it was decided that when the young aeronauts were ready to ascend, some of the lumbermen, being idle at this time of year and ready for anything to break the monotony of their life, would go to the spot where the rival balloon was fastened.

Both men would be put under surveillance and if any desire to injure the boys was shown, rough treatment would follow.

At last—at last the professor and his companion would endeavor to ascend, but in some way this must be prevented.

Trust a crowd of reckless, fun loving lumbermen for finding a means to detain the pursuers until those they followed had a long start.

Sleep had not visited our boys much of late, and they were glad to lie down.

At three o'clock Bob was awake.

He found the breeze very light, but the clouds were moving in exactly the quarter he wished.

That settled it.

Pete was aroused, and the whole house astir.

Bob suggested leaving Petite Barbara with these kind friends, but she would not hear of it.

They went to the balloon, accompanied by the entire household—indeed, the signal had been passed along, and it soon became apparent that the whole village was astir.

A balloon ascension was an event of tremendous importance in those good folks, and to have two more, without any charge of admission, was quite enough to arouse every inhabitant.

So with an audience of sympathetic people around, they prepared to go aloft.

Bob made inquiries concerning those whom they had reason to fear, and received such intelligence as caused him to smile.

There was little danger to be apprehended on that score at present.

So they thanked one and all for the kindness shown, gave the word to let go, and with the vociferous shouts of the assemblage, sped upward into the pure light of early dawn.

Fainter grew the shouts from the dark earth below, and at length they ceased entirely.

All around was complete silence.

The sun peeped up over the horizon, even while the earth below the balloon was wrapped in darkness.

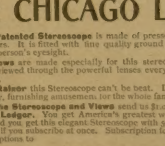
At length morning came to the world underneath.

They drifted lazily on, the air being sluggish.

No signs of the other balloon could be seen, which fact amazed the boys not a little.

It proved that the lumbermen had kept their word, though it was impossible to say whether they were simply detaining the aeronaut's balloon, or putting the two men through a sweating system on account of

MORPHINE
PAINLESS HOME TREATMENT.
ST. JAMES SOCIETY, Suite 131, 1181 Broadway, New York.
We will send any one addicted to the Morphine, Laudanum, or other drug habit a free trial treatment of the most remarkable remedy ever discovered. Refractory cases solicited. Confidential correspondence invited from all, especially physicians.

STEREOSCOPE AND 50 VIEWS
FREE


FREE
With One Year's Subscription to
THE CHICAGO LEDGER
This Newly Patented Stereoscope is made of pressed steel, handsomely enameled in two colors. It is fitted with fine quality ground lenses, which are easily adjusted to fit any person's eyesight.
The Fifty Views are made especially for this stereoscope from original photographs. When viewed through the powerful lenses, objects stand out as natural as life.
As An Entertainer this Stereoscope can't be beat. It is interesting and instructive to everybody, furnishing amusement for the whole family and their friends.
To Secure the Stereoscope and Views send us $1.00 for one year's subscription to The Chicago Ledger. You get America's greatest weekly every week for a year for the dollar, and you get this elegant Stereoscope with 50 views absolutely free, all charges prepaid, if you subscribe at once. Subscription for Canada $1.50 per year. Send subscription to what they may have attempted at the time our friends quitted the campus.
W. D. BOYCE CO., BOYCE BUILDING, CHICAGO, ILL.

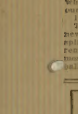
It was very pleasant.

They ate the breakfast which Barbara's pew-found girl friend Molly had put up in a splint basket, and their appetites were rendered particularly keen by the crisp atmosphere through which the course of the balloon took them.



MEN

If you lack vital power, have weaken-ing drains, have become nervous, ner-vously excitable, easily fatigued, have varicocele or stricture, try the Windsor Vacuum Developer. A home treatment that you need not be ashamed to use. Will build you up and restore you to full manhood. It fails to help you. Don't be discouraged, don't be humbugged by experts, or cheap quackery. Don't do it. Send Booklet and full particulars sent sealed in plain cover-ings, free. Write today. THE WINDSOR MFG. CO. 500 Barclay Block. DENVER, COLO.

12 CENTS. Contact who ever offered. It includes the big 64-page Catalog of Bargains, and the Special Offer by which you can get a 25c Watch for 12c. Send for this catalog and with it we will send you FREE a Beautiful Ring. Address, NOVELTY MFG. CO., Dept. 1, Chicago.

MAKE MONEY BY RAISING POULTRY. Pleasant and Profitable Work. We will start you. Send for our Free Booklet. Address Philadelphia Poultry Supply Co., Philadelphia, Pa.

FITS CURED. When I say cured, I mean the disease of Fits, Epilepsy or Falling Sickness a life-long study and I warrant my remedy to cure the worst cases. Because others have failed is no reason for not now receiving a cure. Send at once for treatise and a Free Bottle of my Infallible Remedy. Give Express and Post Office. DR. H. G. ROOT, 183 Pearl St., New York.

"PERSONAL"

Any lady or gentleman wishing to correspond with the opposite sex for the purpose of matrimony should write at once to us. We have a large list of persons wishing to correspond with others for this end. Many pleasant acquaintances and warm friends are made through our agency. Sealed particulars free. We refer to this paper. Address with stamp, reply and membership blanks, Lock Box 488, Personal Correspondence Club, Chicago, Ill.

MENDING TISSUE

The WONDER of the Age. No sewing or darning. Repairs clothing, silk, satin, cotton or woolen goods, kid gloves, kid shoes, rubber boots, oil clothes, carpets, rugs, etc. Mends in a minute. Package, postpaid, 10 cents; 3 packages, 25 cents. Agents wanted everywhere. Big money. Write for terms. Sample free. Address, MENDING TISSUE CO., Dept. 1, Chicago.

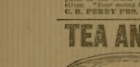
MEN ONLY

CACTUS CREAM CURES SCALLOP. RESTORES VITALITY. BANISHES WRINKLES.

Restores youthful complexion and vigor.

Cactus Cream is an outwardly applied salve. The only to the genital organs. It is healing, soothing and invigorating. It prevents premature decay. Makes weak men strong and strong men stronger. Is the original and only Cactus Cream, and is sent to all parts of the World. Price $1.00. Sealed so no one can tell what it is. "Your money back if it fails to benefit." C. B. PERRY PUB. CO., LYNBROOK, New York.

TEA AND COFFEE



STRAINER.

Fits any Sized Cup.

This great combination is made of Aluminum, finished exactly as the metal. It never rusts or wears out. The strainer can be used without the cup. It is the most convenient article you ever handled. Every housekeeper should have one. Sent to any address postpaid upon receipt of 75 cents in postage or money. We guarantee these strainers for 10 years. Send 2c cents in postage or money order, or you can have it sent C. O. D. when paid we will send you two strainers. Address, W. C. WARD & CO., Dept. 1, Fulton, Ill.

LIFE IN THE WOODS.

This is a very useful book, being a Doctor, Nurse and Guide combined. It tells how to treat all diseases and injuries with home remedies. It tells what to eat in case of illness or accident; what not to eat in case of illness or accident, and how to avoid accidents. It tells how to treat all diseases of the eye, ear, throat, lungs, heart, stomach, liver, kidneys, bowels, blood, nerves, skin, bones, muscles, head, feet, hands, fevers, sunstroke, poisons, etc. It tells how to treat burns, frost bites, sprains, bruises, dislocations, fractures, etc. It tells how to treat children and babies. It tells how to treat women. Every woman should have a copy. It tells how to treat men. Every man should have a copy. It tells how to treat everybody. Every family should have a copy. Sent postpaid for 25 cents. Stamps or silver. Write today. Address, DR. WARD & CO., Dept. 1, Fulton, Ill. Ask for "Life in the Woods," when ordering.

BLOOD POISON

FOR MORE THAN TWENTY YEARS we have made a specialty of blood poisons a specialty. Primary, Secondary or Tertiary Blood Poison Permanently Cured. You can be treated at home under same guaranty. Capital $500,000. We solicit the most obstinate cases. If you have exhausted the old methods of treatment, and still have aches and pains, Mucous Patches in Mouth, Sore Throat, Pimples, Copper-Colored Spots, Ulcers on any part of the body, Hair or Eyebrows falling out, write for proof of cures. 50 page book free.

COOK REMEDY CO., 1730 MASONIC TEMPLE, Chicago, U. S. A.

When answering advertisements you will favor the advertiser and the publishers by mentioning The Chicago Ledger.

After a while their progress became more rapid.

They were not so high but what they could see the distinguishing features of the country below.

Now came

Bob was studying a map closely.

"Ten miles an hour," he declared, about two o'clock, "a bee-line from start to finish."

Pete looked curious.

"Where do we land?" he asked, surveying the map.

"No need of that. Look away over yonder. Take the glass. What do you see?"

"Flags and banners of all kinds, and buildings."

"You recognize the sight?"

"Looks like a county fair, I declare."

"Just so. That's Grantsville and the fair is in progress. We are heading for it. I propose to land right in the middle of the grounds. Watch us drop down. That is where my mission calls me."

This capital story of boyhood luck and adventure will be continued in the Ledger issue of next week. It will be to your pleasure and profit to follow its characters to the dramatic and remarkable close. Would you like to see the first number with the first or six of our fine spring patterns entirely free? Then subscribe for the Ledger and they will be sent to you. Read our premium announcements on pages thirteen and fifteen.

WE CELEBRATE.

Upon the Fourth day of July
We get our auto and we fly
Across the land in happy style,
Careening on for mile and mile.
And long before the day is done
Because we love our country so.

Some of us also seek the field
Where curves and inshoots are revealed,
We whoop and yell and madly root
As down to third the runners scoot,
Why do we cheer the batsman's blow?
Because we love our country so.

Some of us find the picnic grove,
Where we can eat and drink and love
And there we view with startled eyes
The ants and spiders in the pies.
Why do we stand for it? O,
Because we love our country so.

Still others sit within the hall
And hear the famous speaker haul
In fiercely patriotic tones
The same time-honored platitudes.
And why is this? You don't know?
Because we love our country so.

The Death-Key Mystery.

(Continued from page seven.)

I hope you will bear me company, and as it's late, we might as well stay to dinner, I suppose—Mr. Keeneye?"

"Certainly not," said Moore angrily. "We will return to the city at once. Come, Sophy, look for that key, Moore, that we may not detain the ladies any longer than necessary."

"Daughter," said Mrs. Le Brune, "play Mr. Keeneye one of your brilliant little studies when you have finished 'Meditation.'" Then turning to Keeneye: "Through the window Jansen Moore could see them slowly walking through the grass. It seemed at first almost a good luck for him to be left alone with the young lady. It almost seemed as if fortune favored his situation, though in truth, it was perfectly true to life; for the parents of young women may not be forced to an issue in order that a fond mother may have her daughter perform before the distinguished guest."

At first, we say, Moore regarded this tete-a-tete as a direct piece of fortune. But as he covertly glanced at the face of the elegant little Southerner, he began to think the luck was ill. Her face wore a look which indicated a long and difficult road to travel.

There was a moment or two of profound silence as Sophia walked to go to the piano.

"Miss Le Brune," said Jansen Moore, "your mother thinks I am Keeneye."

"I received a telegram from him," Sophia interrupted, "and, without the undeceiving my mother—that the deception was necessary; I cannot imagine why. I am obeying instructions, though with difficulty."

"In the meantime," the young man began—

"In the meantime, I know you are Mr. Moore," said Miss Le Brune, coldly, "and ever be so again, I need not pretend to treat you otherwise."

"Unfortunately," said Moore, "your mother mistook me for Keeneye when I first—"

"Yes," the other interposed, her blue eyes sparkling and her lips looking as if displeasure, "she told me she read my letter to you; as she supposed, to Keeneye, and you let her read it to the end."

"In that letter—" Moore stammered.

"I have no desire to go into it," curtly, "to alter the opinion expressed in that letter. Shall I play for you?"

"Excuse me only for a moment," cried the young man in despair, "it was your mother I was interested in knowing my fault; she insisted upon it, and there wasn't any way to do it up. She got hold of the letter and it told the bad impression you had formed of me. I wanted to know what it was. I wanted to know what you had against me. I had to know; and so I couldn't speak up and say, 'Don't read it to me, don't tell me, I am Jansen Moore. Don't you see? I couldn't, you know. Because I was interested in knowing my fault as you saw them."

"Indeed?" said Sophia, smiling unkindly. "Yes, that I might correct them."

"You thought, then, that it was gentlemanly to listen to a letter meant entirely for another."

"If course it wasn't," said Jansen Moore humbly. "I know it wasn't. But at the time I didn't think of that. I only wanted to know your opinion. There are times—crises in one's life—when other considerations than those of vital importance than the mere fact of acting like a—in the conventional manner, as it were—"

"Oh," said Sophia sharply, "do you mean sometimes a gentleman is not a—" She paused.

"All rules have exceptions," Moore said, "and the conduct of life has no rules save one other. One should never listen to other people's private letters. But here was a letter upon which my fortune hung."

"No true interests of your life," said Sophia sneeringly, "could have depended upon hearing my opinion of you."

"But they could, Miss Sophia; they could—they did—they do."

"In that case," said the young lady, lifting her face toward his in her most aggravating manner, that is to say with her most charming pouty dignity, and her blue eyes, "you should have asked me, and not gone to my mother in a false character."

Jansen Moore looked at her sternly.

Sophia seated herself at the piano. "I will play something, Jansen Moore," she said in a low that by one of my most brilliant studies."

Her little hands sank into the first chords of the composition and rolled them as it were, to the bottom of the keys. A flood of music was squeezed out of them. Then she touched the first note.

Jansen Moore watched Keeneyes upon his knees in the yard, digging an iron stake here and there into the long grass, while Mrs. Le Brune looked on sternly, as if keeping a close eye on the servant. He felt he was losing time and opportunity.

"Miss Sophia," he said, "can you talk while you play?"

"Yes," said the young lady, "but I cannot listen."

Jansen Moore shifted himself to the other foot. Sophia began to execute a run of notes from the keys as if coaxing cold water upon her composition.

"Well," said Moore, "please talk to me, then, for I am the most miserable fellow in the universe."

Sophia, still playing, said slowly, "Justice or—"

"I think," said Moore, "that hearing what you wrote your mother was punishment enough for my offense."

"Your ideas of the degrees of punishment are landmarks."

"Won't you forgive me, Miss Sophia?"

"Forgive? I don't know. I'm sure about it? It is the way you ought to think about it—and don't—that makes me—but let me play."

When she had finished "Meditation," she immediately began another piece. "I have my most brilliant study." She tucked down her head, and began to play with excitement and came up through waves and foam of clashing notes.

"Miss Sophia," cried Moore in something like a wail, "your mother is coming back. It will be over in a few minutes."

"What will be over?" she asked, stopping her execution in astonishment.

"Keeneye—this chance to—er— to make you think better of me. Please think better of me, Miss Sophia. I can't go on having you think this way of me. I—I would do anything to please you. Tell me what you consider me. Let me prove to you that I am a good enough sort of a fellow to be worth—to be worth your while to gain your good opinion."

Sophia looked at Sophia looking at him intently, as if she found him a good deal of a puzzle.

"I would!" cried Moore. "Yes, I would—oh, your mother is coming!"

Sophia looked. "Why shouldn't she come?"

Jansen Moore wrung his hands. "If you really want me to think better of you," said Sophia sowly, "though I can't think why you should be so much interested, file for a strange—but if you want a chance to prove yourself, go to her now."

"Mr. J. J. Jansen!" cried Moore ruefully.

"Yes, go to him and tell him the whole truth. Tell him how you listened to the letter, and why you listened. Tell him everything and in short, everything about you since you left Harvard. Tell him anything."

"But he—" Moore stammered.

"I have always been mortally afraid of him," said the young lady, "and he is a man who does things. He was my guardian for a week ago. Go and tell him of your conduct."

"And—but—last night—he already has tried to—"

"Of course," said Sophia coldly, "you must do what you think best, of course."

She rose from the piano stool.

"I will do it," Moore desperately. "I'll go to him. I'll tell him."

"If he kills you," said Sophia cruelly, "I'll have you sent back to your mother, getting into trouble."

"I hope it is partly an excuse, for I have been in real trouble."

"I think," said Sophia with sudden sympathy, "that you had better go to him at once to make mistakes."

"Miss Sophia," said Moore, "if the one you are alone with—I mean yourself—is a weak character at the vital moment—"

"You must not take that so much to heart," said Sophia gently. "Don't think of that. I am sure I am not the person to good for you."

Just then Mrs. Le Brune led in Keeneyes as if delivering up a prisoner.

"No key," said Keeneyes cheerfully, twirling his false mustache in imitation of the mustache Moore had once worn.

"By the way," said Sophia suddenly, looking at Moore, "I thought you had a—"

"But we must go now," said Moore hastily. "If anything develops, trust me to keep you informed. Come, Moore, you have spent a fruitless morning; you are not making the detective I had hoped to fashion out of you. You are too slow; and you think too much of yourself to put your whole mind on your duties."

"This is crushing," murmured Keeneyes.

"It is discipline," said Moore severely. "Come along!"

This clever and humorous story of detective work will be continued in the next week's Ledger. Do not miss reading it. A lot of great and timely stories will appear in the Ledger during the next year. Send in your subscription and you will find your self repaid ten times over. Our splendid patterns and stereotonges will be sent to you without cost. See announcement on pages thirteen and fifteen.

Two Faces Under One Hat.

(Continued from page eleven.)

has passed that I have not seen Kate's sweet face before me in my dreams."

"And this gold, my boy, is to clear your name, if it is not already cleared, and unlike your fond hearts would be."

"Go in the morning, Arthur, and in your absence I will try and disguise our claim enough to answer our purpose. You must leave the money secured in litt from our pages and place your father in easy circumstances."

"Never fear, John."

Early the following morning Arthur was off.

At the noon hour of the day following John Merrill was seated in the shanty door composed by smoke.

"Heavens!" he exclaimed, springing to his feet.

At this instant the form of a bareheaded man, on horseback, was seen dejected fer-or and despair, with a cry came tumbling down the almost abrupt cliff on the opposite side of the gulch and was met with a splash beneath the waters of the creek.

John Merrill scarcely hesitated in a moment's time was up to his waist in water, dragging from the rapid current the half drowning form.

As he pulled him upon the bank, the faces of the two men came in contact for the of the cliff.

"Is he dead, partner?" one of the men cried out.

"Dead? No!" shouted Merrill. "But in God's name, what means this?"

"We will be with you in a moment," was the reply. "Handle him. If he is dead, let him fallen in the creek, we would have been charged the trouble."

Here the forms on the cliff disappeared.

"Help me! Save me!" cried the trembling wretch, as he attempted to struggle to his feet. "They will murder me!"

"What do you mean?"

"Oh, God! I've lost. lost! My leg is broken! Help, help! Hide me! Quick, quick!"

"Why, you are wounded," said Merrill, "blood is oozing from your shoulder."

"Oh, if it had only killed me! Help, help! They will hang me!"

"Not unless you deserve it," said Merrill. "I will not see an innocent man murdered, never fear. First they will have to take my life. I know what it is to be falsely accused."

"Bless you, sir! God bless you! But scoundrel with a bullet in the side struck that ledge half-way down the cliff. Don't let them hang me! I am not guilty! I am not the man who killed him!"

"Liar!" shouted one of the men, as six of them appeared upon the top of the cliff twenty feet to the right. "You murdered him, and he knows that were lived. Where is there a cottonwood? There is one! Your rope, Carr! Quick! Run the noose on it! Hang him! Hanging is better than the earth and sky."

The man addressed as Carr, a brawny miner who held a coil of rope in one hand, rapidly formed a noose, and strode forward.

John Merrill leaped between him and the quaking figure on the grass, with extended arms.

"Halt!" he cried. "This man shall not be murdered. Before you murder him you prove to me that he is guilty of the crime you charge. Why, he is wounded and helpless. It would be cruel to murder him. Give him a chance to prove his innocence. I, myself, will give him a fair trial before Judge Lynch."

"You are talking big chances, young fellow," said the one who had first spoken, and who seemed to be the leader. "There are two men dead, and we have got look straight and all right. I see your shanty over there. You live there, I reckon, Mr. Carr. I will satisfy the young chap. Search that wheip, he may have arms."

"My revolver is at the bottom of the creek," said the wounded man, "or you'd have found it. Search me, Carr, they will like to you!"

"There were eight of us prospecting back in Timmon's Gulch, three miles west," said the leader. "Three of us were brothers. My name is Jo Wilkins. The next was my brother Jim, Charley, the youngest, the one we pounded out of the gang. Ohio, to guard and protect, lies back at Timmon's Gulch, a corpse, and this is the murdering hound that killed him!"

"He came to our camp not ten days ago and asked for work. We had no use, and in three nights as many of our fellows were robbed of their dust. We suspected him, but could not swear to it, and would not accuse him on suspicion. On the morning this morning I went to the shanty where we were lodged—Charley, with this fellow. Charley's back was pulling the bag of dust, and his head the boy awoke.

"I seized one of the villain's arms and gave one cry—it was my last. With his other hand this wretch drove the keen blade of his dirk home to poor Charley's heart, withdrew it, and dashed away, bearing the bag of dust with him.

"Jim and I turned to our feet in time to catch sight of his flying form. We both fired, and then it was that he was wounded. He dropped the dust, but fi thi. darkness we lost him."

(Continued on page fifteen.)

A MOST REMARKABLE THING.

A very remarkable thing
I sing
Concerning Aurelius Blye.
He furnished his girl and his boy
Much joy
With fireworks the Fourth of July.
Firecrackers, torpedoes—that's what
He bought—
Sky-rockets and candles of Rome,
Inventions productive of hums
And bombs,
And fountains of fiery foam.
He carried them into the yard
And got
Some matches for touching them off.
He said: "I will show you right now
Just how
The rockets should act in the trough."
The children delighted they were glad.
Their dad
Would make all the fireworks explode.
Aurelius bent over to scratch
A match
And just how to strike it he showed.
He smiled: "See the flame. It pursues
The fuse.
Until it gets into the charge.
And then with a vigorous whiss
It's off
A-romping the heavens at large."
The children delighted they were glad—
The night
Was graced by the rocket that rose.
They set up the merriest shout
About
The sputtering sparklings and glows.
He died off the list by one—
Such fun for
The children there never was known.
He didn't blow off with a bomb
His thumb,
Get burned and in misery groan.
And so this remarkable fading
I sing
Concerning Aurelius Blye
Whose children were glad that he Shot the rockets they Never murmured. That's why!

The Damnation of Father Fitzgerald

(Continued from page five.)

to answer the question in my own mind?" he thought. "But this is the last time—I must be positive. I must make no mistake."

At last turning again to the bed he took the feverish hand between his own and said:

"You are making it very hard for me, Agnes."

"Mercedes has more wisdom than yourself, let her decide," fell from the lips of the sufferer.

"That is unfair and does not do credit to my manhood, Agnes," he answered, as his quick eye caught the startled glance and rapid breathing of the young girl who stood looking on and listening to this dramatic scene, while her happiness hung in the balance. Love pulled him both ways. Finally he yielded to the stronger impulse.

"Agnes," he said very tenderly, "for the reason that I think you do not understand what and how much you are asking, and that you are deceived in your condition, I am going to tell you that I cannot make you this promise. When you are better we shall——"

"You are killing me," murmured the woman, and turning her head aside motioned him away.

Fabian dropped on his knees beside the bed, while Mercedes knelt at the foot. When they rose, he said:

"Agnes, have you no further word to say to me, only you?"

He broke off and looked anxiously into her face. Mercedes stepped quickly forward.

"She is dead," whispered the frightened girl.

"She sleeps," he corrected. "It is either the sleep of death or exhaustion. I know not which. Call the nurse."

"The doctor will return directly. I will watch until he comes," said the nurse. "You might step into the other room for a little while."

Fabian motioned Mercedes to follow him, and with the eyes of the officers constantly upon them, the lovers, who were so greatly tried, went and stood in the adjoining room. Mercedes sobbing violently.

"I think you should have promised, Fabian," she pleaded.

"It was hard deciding what to do, Mercedes. I do not believe, though, in deathbed requests and promises. It is unfair to the living and to the dying. The latter are too weakened mentally to judge of what they ask. It was supreme torture for me to deny her anything at such a moment. Perhaps she will be better within a few days and I may convince her that she is wrong."

"I fear she will never regain consciousness—that she will not recover. I believe this to be her last sleep and she will never again open her eyes in this world. If she does, Fabian, you had better promise."

"No, I cannot, Mercedes, but God knows how I suffer."

"Then I must, Fabian—I must promise her not to marry you, and keep my promise. It were better for us to suffer than to deny her this last request. Please do not try to dissuade me, Fabian, it is such a great moment to her. If she dies, she will be comforted. If she lives, she may release me, but humor her, we must."

"I think you are wrong—absolutely wrong Mercedes. Weigh every word and act at this time."

With breathless, prayerful hearts the two continued to stand with clasped hands waiting for some intelligence from the sick room. After an hour had passed in suspense, the nurse came to the door and called to them.

"She has come out of the sleep, but her moments are numbered. She desires to speak with you again."

Mercedes tightened her grasp on Fabian's hand and whispered:

"Be brave, Fabian—I must grant her request."

Now entering the room the two stood by the bed expecting to listen to a last appeal; instead, the dying woman smiled up into their faces and murmured:

"I know now that you are right, Fabian, I was wrong. I have been away from this earth since I talked to you. I saw Andrew Wells clasped in his arms. It meant a glimpse into the beautiful Eternity where I am going. I now understand how your hearts are bound. Forgive me for trying you so greatly. Guard and love Mercedes always, Fabian. My blessing upon both your heads."

With this, the invalid relapsed into a state of coma once again and after a little while all was over.

Though sorely grieved at their loss, the lovers were much relieved to have the blessing of the dying one and realize that she was happy in her last conscious moments.

"Who was Andrew?" questioned Mercedes when a little later the priest rose to take his departure.

"The man she was to have married. He died a few days before the day set for the wedding."

It was with a breaking heart that Mercedes now watched her lover handcuffed and led back to the carriage that waited in front of the house.

He was going back to his prison cell—perhaps to his death! Ah, what a house of mourning!

The continuation of this splendid story will be found in the ledger issue of next week. If you are not a regular subscriber to the Ledger we would like to have your name on our list. The Ledger is only $1.00 per year; it is worth many times that amount. Send in your subscription, for many great stories that you cannot afford to miss will appear during the coming months. With every subscription we send entirely free of cost one of our splendid stereoscopes or any six of our Standard patterns. See pages thirteen and fifteen.

Two Faces Under One Hat.

(Continued from page fourteen.)

"Don't believe him, friend! Don't believe him! It was not me!" cried the prostrate wretch.

"We returned to the shanty," continued Jo Walls. "Charley was stone dead, and clutched in one hand was this bit of cloth. As you can see, it is part of the coat sleeve of Charley's murderer. Look at him now! Are you satisfied? Ah, he'll can't save him! We roused the camp as soon as day dawned and tried him. Finally we started him from a deserted claim—he ran this way. You know the rest. We are judge and jury in this case. Stand aside, young man! Carr, noose him and we will drag him to the cottonwoods!"

John Merrill stepped from before the wretch he was shielding: "Take him," he said, "he deserves it!"

"Help! Help!"

The tightening of the noose silenced his cries, as the strong arms of the miners dragged him towards the cottonwoods.

"Best learn his name," thought Merrill.

"Mr. Wells," he said, "the villain must die, but it might be well to learn something of him, then we can notify his family, if he has one."

"Such a brute can have no family," replied Wells, "but he gave his name as Philip Baily, though it may be a false one."

Next week's Ledger will contain the conclusion of this highly interesting story. We advise you to read it to the end. Do you take the Ledger regularly? You ought to do so, as it is acknowledged to be one of the most entertaining papers printed in America. For a year's subscription we send fifty-two copies of the Ledger and six fine patterns free or one of our King Cameras. Note our premium advertisements on pages thirteen and fifteen.

She Knew Him.

The Husband—Some of my friends say I'm a parasite to a fault.

The Wife—Yes, and especially your own.

FREE---6 STYLISH PATTERNS---FREE

We will send any six of these fashionable, up-to-date patterns ABSOLUTELY FREE with one year's subscription to THE CHICAGO LEDGER. These patterns are from the latest Paris designs. They are best for the home dressmaker, being simple and economical.

One year's subscription to the LEDGER costs only one dollar. You get this fine family story paper every week for a year for the dollar, and you get six of these elegant patterns FREE, by subscribing now.

Select any six patterns—send the number and size of each, with one dollar to

Subscription for Canada $1.50 per year. PATTERN DEPT., CHICAGO LEDGER, CHICAGO, ILL.

5622 SEVEN GORED SKIRT 24 TO 36 WAIST
5627 BOYS' OVERALLS 4 TO 8 YEARS
5619 FIVE GORED PETTICOAT 22 TO 32 WAIST
5675 MISSES' CHESTERFIELD COAT 14 AND 16 YEARS
5651 GIRLS' JUMPER DRESS WITH GUIMPE 4 TO 10 YEARS
5626 CHILDS DRESS 2, 4 AND 6 YEARS
5645 OVER BLOUSE WITH GIRDLE 32 TO 40 BUST
5632 BOYS' BLOUSE SUIT 6 TO 12 YEARS
5617 FIVE GORED SKIRT 22 TO 30 WAIST
5643 BLOUSE OR SHIRT WAIST 32 TO 44 BUST
5623 FITTED JACKET 36 TO 46 BUST
5636 GIRLS' DRESS 6 TO 12 YEARS
5620 SHIRT WAIST OR BLOUSE 32 TO 42 BUST
5642 BOYS' BLOUSE 4 TO 12 YEARS
5677 OVER BLOUSE OR JUMPER 32 TO 42 BUST
5634 FANCY YOKE BLOUSE 32 TO 42 BUST
5643 PRINCESSE JUMPER GOWN 32 TO 40 BUST
5641 CORSET COVER 34 TO 44 BUST
5668 GIRLS' COAT 4 TO 12 YEARS
5678 CAPE ETON 34 TO 42 BUST
5642 TUCKED FLOUNCE SKIRT 22 TO 30 WAIST
5657 GIRLS' DRESS 8 TO 14 YEARS
5624 ONE-PIECE KIMONO SMALL, MEDIUM, LARGE
5676 NINE GORED PLAITED SKIRT 22 TO 30 WAIST

Don't Be A Chump

and Pay $23 for what we will Sell you for $9

A stylish, substantial, Wool Tailor or Scotch Cassimere Suit, made to measure to labor and guarantee to fit or no charge.

A fine Black or Blue Cheviot Cutaway Frock	$10.00
A pair of stylish Lace Shoes, the correct last	2.50
A fancy striped Outing Shirt, with Collars and Cuffs	1.00
A silk Necktie, Hose, pair of any style	.50
A Suspender, Garter, Armband and Cuff Holder	.50
A pair of fancy Linle Thread Socks	.50
Thousands of imitators. Advance for this suit, $23.00

Our Price, $9 for all.

Write for latest samples of cloths from which we make these suits, fashion plates of same and furnish rule and full particulars. A one-cent postal card will bring all to your address.

THE GENTS' COMPLETE OUTFITTING CO., Dept. 41., 161 Market Street, CHICAGO.

DETECTIVES Wanted, reliable men wanted in every locality, to act under orders; no experience required. Write H. C. Webster, Indianapolis, Ind.

MEN WANTED everywhere to distribute circulars, ads, tacking, tack signs, etc. Steady employment. Standard Mfg. Co., Chicago, Ill.

AIDS to BEAUTY Over little work to earn $100 to anyone. Given away. Send stamp. Address H., Box 450, Duluth, Minn.

COUPON Send this Coupon and Seventy-five Cents and Full Cost varied No. to my address for 26 weeks at this change. A great No. 81018 variety of styles. Bridge, N. Y. Views, Etc. Also Barometer, Niagara Falls, U.S. Capitol, etc. Sent by mail. Name of the hole & address 5c. each. Dr. Adams Studio, 33 W. Broadway, N. Y.

A FREE CURE FOR THE TOBACCO HABIT.

Mrs. J. Kay, Box 2154, Chicago, Ill., has discovered a simple, harmless remedy for the tobacco habit, which could have hundreds of thousands of others. Will send prescription and directions free to any one who may ask for it.

DON'T BE BALD. Hiscox Safe Hair Restorer will restore gray hair. Never fails. Agents can have magnificent hair. Will not pay for hair restoration, but will pay for idea. Address Lawrence Hair Expert, 1214 Tenth, Philadelphia

MONEY WE MAKE BIG MONEY $5 to $20 per day sure and introduce the Wonderful Electric Pocket Battery. Sells to dealers and to consumers. MONEY COMING IN BY MAIL. Write for terms. Sample free. Address E. M. DOWD & CO., 19 Fox Street Brooklyn, PHILADELPHIA.

MEN WANTED in every locality in the United States with rig or capable of handling team to introduce our guaranteed poultry and stock specifics. Big commissions paid. Steady employment to good reliable men. We pay our own men $2 a day and expenses. Address, with stamp, PEERLESS MEDICINE COMPANY, London, Ontario, Canada.

WANTED

information regarding good farm that is for sale and which can be bought of owner. NO AGENTS NEED ANSWER. Wish to hear from owner only willing to close his own deal and save buyer paying big commissions and have price to some agent. Would also like to hear of good stock farm for sale. Address, INFORMATION DEPARTMENT, Land Exploration Co., Minneapolis, Minn.

This ELEGANT Watch $3.75

Sent C. O. D. anywhere for examination. Looks like a $25 watch and runs as well as one. Has the appearance of a solid gold watch, and with which jewel movement and stem wind and set. Guaranteed for 10 years. Will last for years. Send no money. Write us and if you mention it equal to any $25 GOLD FILLED WATCH Warranted 20 YEARS for its name and $3.75 and it is yours. For ladies' or gents' size. Mention which you want. Address, R. FARRIER & CO., 315, 320 South, CHICAGO.

FREE

Ladies' White Bleacher Oxfords are cool and comfortable, and are the most stylish Oxfords for ladies' wear this season. Made in the latest lasts, best up to date patterns, with Vesting Tops, Patent Leather tips and Turned Soles. WE WILL GIVE THEM FREE to any lady who will send us 3 subscribers (one can come from her self) at 25 cents each for 3 months. Write us at once. When sent, send us your size and we will send you the shoes by return mail. Address, THE HOUSEHOLD, Boston, Mass.

BOYS' OWN TOYMAKER

This is one of the most entertaining books for boys ever published, entitled, "Every Boy His Own Toymaker." It tells how to make a Steam Engine, a Phonograph, a Telephone, a Microscope, a Telescope, a Magic Lantern, a Printing Press, an Electric Battery, an Electric Telegraph, an Electric Organ, a Photograph Camera, a Sphygmograph